Tells About Recent Wedding at the White House

WASHINGTON.—A story of how the "Cousins club," as the many relatives of the President and Mrs. Wilson are beginning to call themselves, organized into a little reception committee and did their best to make the diplomats "feel at home" at the wedding at the White House the other day, was told by Mrs. George Howe of New York, one of the cousins.

COUSINS CLUB

Mrs. Howe is the wife of George Howe, who lived for a long while with the president before he went into the White House, and whose education was superintended by the president.

"I was principally impressed at the wedding by the ease at which every one seemed to feel, notwithstanding the 'grandness' of the occasion. There was nothing solemn about it, except the wedding procession and the forming of the line for the reception in the blue room.

"We kept the fun up until 9 o'clock at night. It was just like a great, big family party in the south. I was somewhat surprised that the dignified Marine band should play turkey trotting music for us to dance with in the east room, but they did, and Lieutenant Santelmann and his musicians seemed to enjoy it as much as we did. They laughed and played on and on.

"You know, 'Nell,' as we call Eleanor Wilson, is just crazy about dancing, and she is a very fine dancer, too, one of the best I ever saw. When the music had been stopped for good she waved her hand appealingly to Lieutenant Santelmann, and he laughed and led the band again for us.

"Most of us had supper and dinner and lunch combined at the wedding breakfast. That kept up a long time. There wasn't wine, but we had fruit punch instead.

Visitors Are Attracted by Squirrels in Parks

"SOME day," said a visitor in the capitol grounds the other day, "the famous pigeons of Venice which flock in so great numbers around the Cathedral of St. Mark will have to look to their laurels. These widely known birds may divide the honors of the admiration of tourists with the little gray squirrels which are fast becoming an interesting and picturesque feature of Washington's many fine green spaces."

LOOK PLEASANT

As far as tourists are concerned, here in Washington, many of them are beginning to take photographs of the little animals. Just as nearly every man and woman who visits Venice brings away snapshots showing some member of the party tossing bread crumbs or something else to the great flocks of birds, so are the tourists who stroll through the capitol grounds, the Smithsonian grounds and other parks taking photographs of some one stooping over and holding out a peanue to the snappy little gray animals which are fast losing their extreme timidty.

In his native lair the gray squirrel is about as wild as any animal alive. Hunters who depend upon a gray squirrel or two for breakfast know very well that they will run to cover at the slight sound of a snapping twig; and for that reason a wet day is much better for hunting them than a dry day, as the crackling leaves scare a squirrel into his hole in the tree. However, Washington's squirrels are becoming as friendly as house pets, and the sight of one of them eating from the hand of a tourist is a revelation to the Virginia or Maryland mountaineer, who has to stay as quiet as a stone statue in order to get within shooting distance of one.

The gray squirrels are looked upon by the park authorities here as wards of the nation, and a comfortable sum of money is spent every winter in order to obtain food to keep the little pets from dying in the snows. Old weather sharps look upon the squirrels as indicating the coming of a hard winter the way they hide nuts.

Felines Are Vain? Prize Winners Flee Publicity

PRIZE-WINNING cats on exhibition at the show of the Washington Cat club object to having their pictures taken. The appearance of a newspaper photographer with his little black camera was the signal the other day for a general exodus of the high-priced felines, who are now roaming the streets of the capital.

The next day nearly the entire police force was out searching for the animals, while physicians were busy treating bites and scratches on hands and arms as a result of the scramble that was made for the cats as they gained their freedom. Several persons were severely bitten.

Champion Lady Sonia, a high-priced Persian cat owned by Mrs. F. Y. Mathis of Greenwich, Conn., is one of the missing animals. She was valued at $500 and around her bushy neck was a $1,000 collar of torquoise, sell and gold. Four felines were lined up in front of the camera, and as the photographer said "Hold still, now," the cats jumped. The last seen of them was when they disappeared through the door.

Miss G. Taylor of Syracuse, N. Y., was the most seriously hurt in the attempt to hold the cats. She was bitten and scratched about the hands and arms and had to be treated at a hospital.

Club Formed for the Interior Department Employes

FOR some months Secretary of the Interior Lane has been working on the organization of a club for the interior department employes. He believes that a closer association one with another of the workers of the great interior department would redound to the benefit of all concerned. Secretary Lane met with a good deal of opposition at first, because there are so many kinds of people drawing so many kinds of salaries in this big department, and the social lines are drawn very closely about certain salary grades in all departments in Washington. You could hardly expect a $900 clerk to associate on terms of intimacy in social life with a $1,200 clerk, and so on. Secretary Lane asked one little old lady, who belongs to the Cliff Dweller class of Washington—or, in other words, a "befo' the war" society woman who now works in government employ and takes in boarders for company—if she would assist in organizing this social club of the interior department. The aristocratic old lady very snappishly informed him that she would not; that she was in the interior department for the purpose of earning money, and that she was socially superior to most of the employes. The secretary met up with a good many setbacks of this kind, but in his genial way has been able to smooth out the difference between those social sets and has rounded them into a homogeneous body, and the Home club is now an assured fact.

WHO'S WHO AND WHY

PRESIDENT NATIONAL BASEBALL LEAGUE

Being a governor is all right, but being a baseball president is better. There are many more governors than big league presidents; in fact, there are only two of the latter. Everybody knows who the president of the National league is, and John Kinley Tener, when he ceases to be governor of Pennsylvania to become president of the National league, will be a vastly more widely known public figure than he is now.

Giving up the gubernatorial chair in Harrisburg for the National league president's chair in New York has its advantages, as well as being a unique happening in the history of the national games—political and baseball. The National league presidency is a much higher position, physically at least, for the league's headquarters are on the thirteenth floor of the Metropolitan Tower. Then again. Mr. Tener will have John Heydler, National league secretary, for a faithful adviser, and that is another distinct advantage. Also Mr. Tener will have his salary raised. He is to get $25,000 a year for four years as president of the National league, whereas he receives only $10,000 for governing Pennsylvania. The National league covers a much greater area than the Keystone state and contains spirits quite as turbulent.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT NEW YORK

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

The appointment of Dudley Field Malone as collector of customs at the port of New York, is fraught with political interest. Malone, who is a son-in-law of Senator O'Gorman, is a particular favorite of President Wilson and also of Secretary Bryan and was sent from Washington, where he is assistant secretary of state, to New York to speak for John Purroy Mitchel during the recent mayoralty campaign. Senator O'Gorman was a supporter of [illegible] and he was not consulted [illegible] name of Malone was sent to the senate for the New York collectorship.

The naming of Malone for the New York post, which pays a salary of $12,000, is interpreted as meaning that he will co-operate with Mayor Mitchel and most probably Governor Glynn in the reorganization of the Democratic party in the state. This means that the Wilson adherents will build a machine of their own.

Dudley Field Malone is a native New Yorker, a graduate of St. Francis Xavier college and of the Fordham Law school and a lawyer of considerable talent. He was assistant corporation counsel during the Gaynor administration until last April, when President Wilson made him third assistant secretary of state. Malone was one of the "original" Wilson men.

CALLED MOSES OF CUBA

It took a Cornell man to place Cuba on a sound basis and he has done more in six months than had been accomplished in the preceding four years. The president of Cuba is Gen. Mario Garia Menocal, who was inaugurated May 20, 1913. He is a progressive, capable, efficient, honest man.

Gen. Menocal's achievements have been wide and varied. Personally he is a man of importance, a promoter of enterprises to develop the wealth of the island. He is a man of the highest character and possesses the confidence of all. What he accomplished in his private capacity gave him a wide reputation as an executive. What he has done as president of the young republic of Coba has given him a reputation through the world.

For this young man has proved that Cuba has a right to be considered a stable government; he has discouraged big graft in high places; he has set a high standard of official efficiency, keeping in office men most capable regardless of their political party.

CHIEF OF CHICAGO'S POLICEWOMEN

A few weeks ago the city of Chicago experienced a radical upheaval in its police department. John McWeeny, then chief of the force, became incensed through an imagined slight at the hands of Carter H. Harrison, mayor of Chicago, and resigned his position without warning, leaving a body of 3,000 policemen minus an executive head.

Then for the first time in the history of the great municipality a woman was reckoned in the running for the office which had been vacated—and her name was Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton. Although when the time arrived for the mayor to make public his choice for the important post, it proved to be John Gleason, a captain in the department for many years, the fact still remains that a woman was considered as a possible incumbent for the position of chief.

Mrs. Britton, it may be interesting to know, is one of the most prominent social workers in the United States. She understands police work from the ground up, and although she failed to secure the coveted post of chief, is at present the head of Chicago's new force of policewomen.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Brunette "Villain" Binds and Gags "Heroine"

DETROIT, MICH.—Melodrama stalked at 268 Joseph Campau avenue the other morning when a mysterious, brunette villain slunk into the house, soaked the heroine in the face with his fist, jammed a big revolver under her chin, elaborately bound and gagged her, twirled his black mustachios with the conventional, "Ha, ha," stole one dollar and disappeared.

Margaret Kuhlman, the fourteen-year-old heroine, was so overcome with realism that she spent several hours in bed recovering from the shock and missed a whole day from school, where she is a member of this year's graduating class.

Miss Kuhlman's mother left the house about 6:30 o'clock Monday morning. Several boarders also had left the house, and its sole occupant was Miss Margaret, who was combing her hair before a mirror in a downstairs bedroom preparatory to going to school.

Enter the villain. Miss Margaret saw his reflection in the mirror, turned, and started to scream. Her cry was cut short by a blow from the villain's fist, which caught her on the mouth and sent her reeling against the wall. Dazed, she watched the villain fumble at one of his pockets. After considerable difficulty he extracted a big revolver. With the air of a stage Jesse James he thrust it under her chin, saying: "Uppa with your-r-r-r hands. I havva you in me power-r-r-r." Thus proving himself to be an Italian villain.

Miss Margaret did just what her conscience dictated. She reached for the ceiling. With several yards of stout cord, which he drew from his pocket, the villain bound her hands in front of her. After meditating deeply for a minute he evidently remembered that all regular villains gag their victims. Dumping the contents of a waste paper basket on the floor, he selected a grocer's bill, three personal letters and an advertising circular and crammed them in the girl's mouth. He overcame her apparent distate for them by twisting a towel around her face and knotting it in the back.

For half an hour Miss Margaret was forced to sit in that chair and watch him ransack the house. The gross receipts of his search was a dollar bill.

With a parting "ha, ha!" and a final twirl of the mustachios, better executed this time, he disappeared.

Would-Be "Cops" Mix Their English Up a Bit

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—Noah Webster, well-known author and lexicographer, and Dr. Ben Johnson, another literary light of reputation, strolled into the Federal building while in Indianapolis the other day to look after the sale of their works.

I SEED HIM DONE IT MUST BE RIGHT

"This city," Mr. Webster was saying, "is the literary center of the universe. Next to Boston, Indianapolis is the home of more highbrows than any other city in the world. Ah, there is Charlie Smith!"

It was Charlie Smith and none other. Noah introduced him to the doctor.

"Smith, as you doubtless recall, Johnson," said Webster, "is the author of that famous book, 'C. Smith's Algebra.' What do you know, Charlie?"

"I was on my way to the civil service examination for appointments on the police force," said Smith. "I think it is in this room here."

The three distinguished visitors entered a room on an upper floor, where 25 men were working over examination papers and answering questions propounded by Dr. Edward A. Willis, secretary of the city civil service com-

"Which is correct," asked Dr. Willis of a raw-boned son of Indiana, "'I seen him done it,' or 'I seed him done it?'"

"'I seen him done it' is correct," replied the prospective policeman.

At this juncture Dr. Johnson was taken with a violent fit of coughing and withdrew. His body was found later in the canal.

To Think of It! The Viper Merely Ambled Away

NEW YORK.—Two hundred excited persons, a hospital ambulance and policemen, assisted the other afternoon in the taking of a "movie" drama film that almost caused a riot at Fiftieth street, near Broadway. It wasn't intended they should get into the picture.

The "movie" people had their young heroine walk past a theater entrance. There she was to be approached by a younthful villain, a "masher."

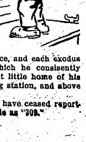
Then she was to turn haughtily from the viper's path. He was to grab her with a snarl upon his handsome lips and pull a revolver and fill her full of bullets.

But there happened to be a large number of gallant men near by, and when the handsome "devil" pulled the gun on the sweet defenseless thing, they pulled a riot. The miserable villain snapped his gun several times—but curses! It refused to explode! Aha! the crowd closed in upon him and bore him to earth. He vainly tried to explain.

What became of the imperiled young lady, or of the man who was taking the picture, no one seemed to know, for they vanished.

He Moves Five Times; Takes His Number Along

PITTSBUGH, PA.—Ivan Winoski, a Polander who has been a resident of this city nearly five years, has given the postal authorities much trouble, although Ivan is one of the most peaceful of men. In fact, his attempt to be law-abiding made all the trouble he has caused. Ivan is married and has several children. He works in a South side mill, earning fair wages, but for some reason he has moved his residence five times within the past 24 months.



Two years ago he lived in South Thirteenth street. Under the postal regulations, all houses where free delivery exists must be numbered. Ivan's house, No. 309, was numberless, and he was told to get a number for it. He did so. But a month later he moved to a street further up. The house he moved into was not numbered. But that did not worry Ivan in the least. He simply took his 309 sign along with him and tacked it above his street door. This caused the mail carriers trouble, of course, but Ivan refused to get into the muss and the number remained above his door.

Ivan has moved his place of residence four times since, and each exodus found him carrying along his original number, 309, which he consistently nailed above his street door. He is now living in a neat little home of his own on the brow of the hill, near the South side pumping station, and above his front door is tacked his original number, 309.

The mail carriers are now used to Ivan's number and have ceased reporting him. He is known among the carriers of the South side as "309."

What became of the imperiled young lady, or of the man who was taking the picture, no one seemed to know, for they vanished.

He Moves Five Times; Takes His Number Along

PITTSBUGH, PA.—Ivan Winoski, a Polander who has been a resident of this city nearly five years, has given the postal authorities much trouble, although Ivan is one of the most peaceful of men. In fact, his attempt to be law-abiding made all the trouble he has caused. Ivan is married and has several children. He works in a South side mill, earning fair wages, but for some reason he has moved his residence five times within the past 24 months.

Two years ago he lived in South Thirteenth street. Under the postal regulations, all houses where free delivery exists must be numbered. Ivan's house, No. 309, was numberless, and he was told to get a number for it. He did so. But a month later he moved to a street further up. The house he moved into was not numbered. But that did not worry Ivan in the least. He simply took his 309 sign along with him and tacked it above his street door. This caused the mail carriers trouble, of course, but Ivan refused to get into the muss and the number remained above his door.

Ivan has moved his place of residence four times since, and each exodus found him carrying along his original number, 309, which he consisently nailed above his street door. He is now living in a neat little home of his own on the brow of the hill, near the South side pumping station, and above his front door is tacked his original number, 309.

The mail carriers are now used to Ivan's number and have ceased reporting him. He is known among the carriers of the South side as "309."

MAKES CHANGES IN CURRENCY SYSTEM

New Money Law Displaces 122-Year-Old Code.

IS FAR-REACHING IN SCOPE

Most Important Law Relating to Finance Passed in Many Years—Essential Features of the Measure Explained in Nontechnical Language.

Washington, Dec. 23.—The new bill affecting the currency, banking and finances of the country is one of the most far-reaching measures relating to finance that have been enacted in many years.

The magnitude of the subject, the diversity of interests affected and the length of the debates in both branches of congress has to follow the changes and grasp the essentials of this highly technical measure in its important bearings on money, finance, banking and the entire range of fiscal subjects, public and private, which it affects.

Summary of the Bill.

With a view, therefore, of presenting succinctly and in non-technical language an epitome of the salient features of the measure as finally framed, the following summary is given of the bill as a whole and of its principal details:

Generally speaking, the first steps to be taken to bring into operation the nation's new financial system will be through an organization committee consisting of the secretary of the treasury, secretary of agriculture and controller of the currency.

Banks have 60 days within which to file their applications for membership in the new system; and one year's time is allowed before the government will compel the dissolution of any national bank that refuses to join.

Will "Take Up the Slack."

The new law will make little direct change in the operation of the present national banks, except to allow them to loan a certain amount of their funds upon farm mortgages.

Its chief purpose is to add a new piece of machinery to the banking system that will "take up the slack" during the changing business conditions of each year; that will give the banks a place to quickly convert their assets into cash in time of need, and that will bring out new federal currency when it is needed, and retire it when money becomes "cheap."

Banks are now required to keep a certain percentage of their deposits as "reserves," part in cash in their own vaults and part of which may be redeposited in the banks of New York, Chicago, St. Louis and other designated cities.

In times of sudden financial demands, when banks have loaned up to the full limit of their resources, these reserves furnish little relief, because if they are paid out to meet demands the banks are left in a precarious condition.

Basic Principle of Law.

The basic principle of the new law is to get these reserve funds out into circulation when necessary without lessening the safety of any bank, and to provide a place to which local banks may rush in a crisis and get cash for the "prime commercial paper" they hold in their vaults.

This is to be accomplished through a chain of regional reserve banks, or "reservoirs of reserves," in which all banks shall deposit a stated part of the money they are required to hold as reserves.

Under the new system, when a financial flurry comes the banks can take commercial paper, such as notes, drafts and bills of exchange, to these "reservoirs," and secure the use of their own reserves, or, if necessary, even the reserve of other banks, by depositing this security.

The new regional banks will receive about one-half of the bank reserves of the country. They in turn will be permitted to loan back to the banks all but 35 per cent. of these reserves, so that in case of emergency millions of cash can be brought out into circulation quickly.

The banks will have to pay for these loans, however, as individuals have to pay for a loan from any local bank, and this charge is expected to prevent the too free use of the reserves held by the regional banks.

New Paper Currency.

A new form of paper currency is also provided for, to come out in case of emergency, and which is expected to go back into the hands of the government when times are normal. These "treasury notes" will be printed by the government and issued through each regional reserve bank, and will bear the guarantee both of the regional bank and of the government.

If the demand for currency in any section of the country exceeds the supply of circulating money a regional bank can secure this new money from the government and put it into circulation; but a gold reserve of 40 per cent. and commercial paper equal to the full value of the note must be held as a reserve behind each note issued.

This provision is expected to be the influence that will drive the new money back into retirement when it is no longer needed.

Clearly Explained.

The following analysis presents the details of the new law without adhering closely to the technical division or language of the measure:

At the head of the system will stand a federal reserve board at Washington, appointed by the president, and to consist of the secretary of the treasury, the controller of the currency and five other members. Two of these shall be expert bankers, but none shall have banking affiliations or own bank stock during their service. This board will exercise general control over the entire system.

The temporary "organization committee," or the federal reserve board, will select from eight to twelve cities where regional reserve banks shall be located and will divide the entire country geographically with these cities as the centers of districts. All national banks in a district will be required to subscribe for the stock of the regional reserve bank in that district and to keep a portion of their reserves there.

Known as "Member Banks."

Local banks will be known as "member banks" because they will own the stock of the regional reserve bank of their district. Each member bank will be required to take capital stock of the regional reserve bank, equal to 6 per cent. of the member bank's capital and surplus. The capital of the regional bank will increase or decrease so that it always represents 6 per cent. of the combined capital and surplus of all the banks of the district that have joined the system.

National banks are compelled to join and state banks are permitted to if they bring their reserve requirements up to the standard set for national banks and submit to national examinations.

Public Can Buy Stock.

Public ownership of the stock of the regional reserve banks is permitted only in case enough banks do not join in any district to provide a capital stock of $4,000,000. In such event the public may purchase the stock in quantities limited to $25,000 for each individual, but the voting of this stock will be placed in the hands of government representatives on the board of directors of the regional reserve bank.

The regional reserve banks may do business only with their member banks, not with the public, except that certain "open market operations" such as the purchase and sale of gold, government, or municipal bonds, and certain forms of bills of exchange, are permitted. These banks will make their earnings from the loans made to member banks, and from the purchase and sale of bonds and foreign bills of exchange.

Must Put Up Cash.

Member banks will be compelled to put up in cash only one-half of their subscription to the capital of the new banks, the rest can be called for if needed by the regional bank. Dividends of 6 per cent. will be paid on this stock to the member banks, and the stock will be non-taxable.

After these dividends are paid one-half of the surplus net earnings goes to create a regional surplus fund, and when this has reached 40 per cent. of the regional bank's paid in capital these earnings are to go into the United States treasury. The balances of the net earnings are to be paid to the United States as a franchise tax.

With the machinery thus created for a new banking system that is supplementary to the commercial banks of the country, the law provides for a gradual transfer of part of the bank reserves to these new "reservoir" banks.

In order not to disturb business conditions, or to withdraw too suddenly the heavy deposits of country banks in the large cities, the law provides that three years may be consumed in shifting these balances and that, if necessary, part of the reserves transferred to the regional banks may consist of commercial paper.

The amount of reserve required from every bank under the new law, and the place where it must be kept, are as follows:

Country banks—Total reserve required, 12 per cent. of demand deposits and 5 per cent. of time deposits. Five-twelfths must be held in the bank's own vaults for two years and four-twelfths after that. For the first year two-twelfths must be kept in the regional bank, increasing one-twelfth each six months thereafter until it reaches five-twelfths of the total reserve. For three years the unallotted part of the reserve may be kept in the banks of reserve cities. After that time it must be kept either in the country banks and vaults or in the regional reserve bank.

Reserve city banks—Total reserve required, 15 per cent. of demand and 5 per cent. of time deposits. Six-fifteenths must be kept in the bank's vaults for the first two years and five-fifteenths after that time. Three-fifteenths must be kept in the regional reserve bank for the first year, increasing one-fifteenth every six months thereafter until it reaches six-fifteenths. For three years the unallotted portion of the reserve may be kept in other banks, in its own vaults, or in the regional bank; after that time in one of the latter two places.

Central reserve city banks (New York, Chicago and St. Louis)—Total reserve required, 18 per cent. of demand and 5 per cent. of time deposits. Seven-eighteenths in the regional reserve banks and the remaining five-eighteenths in either place the bank may choose.

Regional Reserve Banks.

These immense funds of reserves from "member banks," together with government moneys, will make up the deposits of the regional reserve banks. Each of these banks will be administered by a board of nine directors, six of whom will be elected by the banks, and three appointed by the federal reserve board.

The regional reserve banks may redistrict—that is, buy at a discount from its member banks—"prime commercial paper" when the member banks desire to convert these assets into money.

Character of Paper.

The exact terms of this important provision as to the character of paper upon which the regional reserve banks may furnish cash are as follows:

"Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, with a waiver of demand notice and protest by such banks, and federal (regional) reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising out of actual commercial transactions; that is, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used, or are to be used, for such purposes, the federal reserve board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount, within the meaning of this act.

Eligible for Discount.

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit such notes, drafts and bills of exchange, secured by staple agricultural products, or other goods, wares, or merchandise, from being eligible for such discount; but such definition shall not include notes, drafts, or bills covering merely investments or issued or drawn for the purpose of carrying or trading in stocks, bonds or other investment securities, except bonds and notes of the government of the United States.

"Notes, drafts and bills admitted to discount under the terms of the paragraph must have a maturity at the time of discount of not more than 90 days; provided, that notes, drafts and bills drawn or issued for agricultural purposes or based on live stock and having a maturity not exceeding six months may be discounted in an amount to be limited to a percentage of the capital of the federal (regional) reserve bank, to be ascertained and fixed by the federal reserve board."

The "Elastic" Element.

The new treasury notes, which are to furnish the "elastic" element in the currency system, and to add to the country's circulating money in time of need, will come into use in the following way:

The notes will be printed by the government, with a distinctive style for each regional reserve bank. One of the three directors named by the federal reserve board for each regional bank will be known as the "federal reserve agent" for that bank, and a supply of the notes will be placed in his custody.

Should a regional bank desire to pay out more money than its cash resources will permit, the law provides that it may put some of its rediscounted commercial paper into the hands of the "federal reserve agent," and received in return the new treasury notes.

For each note that it puts out into circulation, the regional reserve bank must set aside in gold 40 per cent. of the value of the note as a guarantee for its redemption. This gold, with the commercial paper held by the "federal reserve agent," is the protection behind the new money; but these notes will also be guaranteed by the government and may be redeemed in gold in the United States treasury.

Reserve Required.

Each regional bank, under the act, must keep a reserve of 35 per cent. of the deposits it has received, besides the 40 per cent. gold reserve behind the treasury notes it issues. If the gold reserve behind the notes falls below 40 per cent. a heavy tax is imposed on the bank, which in turn adds the tax to the rate it charges member banks for rediscounts. This was designed to stop an over-expansion of currency. In times of sudden stress the federal reserve board can suspend these reserve provisions, in order to furnish quick relief to any community.

One regional bank cannot again pay out the notes of another, except under a heavy tax. These notes are expected to return to the regional banks and be withdrawn from circulation when the need of their use passes.

Take Up Bonds.

None of the existing forms of currency except the national bank notes will be disturbed by the new law. The United States bonds, now used to secure the issue of national bank notes, are to be taken up at the rate of $25,000,000 a year by the regional reserve banks and new treasury notes or short term three per cent. bonds will take their place. National bank currency is expected gradually to retire.

The federal reserve board will exercise final control over the entire operation of the system. It can compel one regional bank to loan to another in time of need; can suspend all restrictions surrounding the reserves which regional banks must hold, and can remove directors of regional reserve banks whenever it is believed necessary.

Banks in Control.

While the banks retain control of the boards of the regional reserve banks, their connection with the federal reserve board is only through an advisory council, made up of one representative from each federal reserve district. This council will meet in Washington to confer with the federal reserve board "on general business conditions" and to make recommendations and suggestions concerning discount rates, note issues, and reserve conditions.

An important change in national banking methods embraced in the new low will permit all national banks except those in New York, Chicago and St. Louis to make direct loans on five year farm mortgages up to 25 per cent. of their capital and surplus, or up to one-third of their time deposits.

Another provision in the law permits national banks having a capital of $1,000,000 or more to open foreign branches. Similar authority is given to the regional reserve banks, the purpose being to facilitate the development of American trade abroad.

FIVE FUNDAMENTALS OF THE CURRENCY BILL

Issue of currency, guaranteed by the government, based upon notes and bills representing commercial transactions and backed by a gold reserve. The new currency is expected to contract and expand to meet the varied demands of trade.

Concentration of the bank reserves of the country in regional institutions capitalized by the banks of the country and controlled by directors elected by the banks.

Creation of a market for the negotiable commercial paper which forms the bulk of the assets of the banks, where, in time of stress, those assets may be easily and without loss transformed into cash.

Establishment of from eight to twelve great regional banks throughout the country, which will issue currency, rediscount paper and centralize and mobilize the reserves of the local banks.

Creation of a federal reserve board of seven members appointed by the president, with final powers of control and supervision over the entire system.

HOW DISPUTED POINTS WERE ADJUSTED

The following changes affecting points at difference between the senate and house were made in conference:

Comptroller of currency and secretary of agriculture retained as members of organization committee.

Comptroller of currency made ex-officio member of federal reserve board and total membership retained at seven and the term of office fixed at ten years.

Alaska excluded from provisions of act.

After federal reserve districts are established, national banking associations shall have 30 days in which to subscribe for capital stock of reserve banks.

Individuals may purchase up to $25,000 stock in federal reserve bank instead of $10,000, as provided in house bill.

Stock not held by member banks shall not be entitled to any voting power whatever.

Number of regional reserve banks to be "not less than eight nor more than twelve," as provided by the senate.

The minimum capital of regional reserve banks fixed at $4,000,000.

No senator or representative can be an officer of a federal reserve bank.

No director of Class C directors of federal reserve board shall be an officer, director, employe or stockholder of any bank.

Each member bank is permitted to nominate one candidate for Class A and one for Class B directors.

Subscription of member banks 6 per cent. of capital and surplus of subscribing bank.

Senate provision for the guarantee of national bank deposits eliminated.

Use of federal reserve notes as part of reserves of member banks stricken out.

At least one-third of the reserves of the country banks must be held in the vaults of local banks.

House provision for collections at par practically restored, banks to be permitted to collect only actual expenses.

Retirement of 2 per cent. bonds aggregating $300,000,000 within 20 years provided for as against retirement of $125,000,000 in senate bill.

Gold reserve behind the notes remains at 40 per cent., with a graduated tax against any depletion.

Salary of members of the federal board increased from $10,000 to $12,000.

Members of reserve board shall serve two, four, six, eight and ten years instead of one to five years.

Reserve board can liquidate or reorganize reserve banks.

Compensations for directors, officers and employes of federal reserve banks shall be subject to the approval of the federal reserve board.

Recess appointments to reserve board shall expire 30 days after the following session of congress opens.

Net balance of amounts due to and from other banks shall be taken as the basis for ascertaining the deposits against which reserves shall be determined.

PLAN FOR CHOOSING THE RESERVE CITIES

THE BANKING COMMITTEE ANNOUNCES IT WILL HOLD HEARINGS IN FOURTEEN CITIES.

PLAN TWO MONTHS WORK

Two Cabinet Members Expect to Have System Launched by Feb. 22—Secretary McAdoo's Illness Temporarily Postpones Hearings.

Washington, Dec. 29.—The organization committee, which is to launch the new federal reserve banking system for the nation, announces its plan of action for marking out boundaries of reserve districts and the selection of federal reserve cities.

Public hearings will be held in 14 large cities of the country—New York, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, Denver, Seattle, Portland, Ore., San Francisco, Los Angeles, Houston, Tex., New Orleans, Atlanta, Cincinnati and Cleveland.

Will Consider Other Places.

Although these cities are the only ones to be visited, it was announced the advantages of many others would be considered and bankers and others interested in cities not named in its list would be heard.

The two cabinet officers composing the committee will spend practically all of the next two months in this work and expect to conclude their labors about the time all national banks are given in which to announce their intention of becoming members of the system. It will not begin hearings until next week.

McAdoo Is Ill.

Secretary McAdoo left his office suffering from a slight fever, and the other committeeman, Secretary Houston, decided to abandon the task until Mr. McAdoo's recovery. It was said the hard fight Mr. McAdoo made to aid in perfecting the currency law had told upon him. He was a constant adviser of both the senate and house committees and shouldered much of the burden of representing President Wilson in executive consideration of the bill when it was yet in congress. His illness is not believed to be serious, but he is not expected to return to his desk for several days.

The committee's announcement follows, in part:

Banks Have Until February 22.

"Under the provisions of the federal reserve act all national banks are required to signify their acceptance of its terms and provisions on or before February 22, 1914, and all eligible state banks and trust companies are permitted to signify their acceptance within the same time.

"The committee will sit at the custom house in New York City January 2 and 3; in Boston on January 5 and 6, and return to New York for additional sessions on the 8th and 9th. The committee will sit in Washington from January 12 to 17; in Chicago, January 19, 20 and 21; in St. Louis, January 22, 23 and 24; in Denver, January 26. Hearings for the other cities will be held January 28 and March 1. Wherever possible the hearings will be held in government buildings.

COSTLY STORM IN THE EAST

Two Dead, 10 Believed Lost and Million Dollars Damage Done By Gale.

New York, Dec. 29.—The two men drowned in the East river, and 10 men —the crews of two barges wrecked on the New Jersey coast—given up as lost, is the cost in human lives of the storm which swept over this city and this vicinity.

At Seabright, N. J., a fashionable summer resort, 20 miles south of here, most of the houses have either been wrecked or are under water. Several hotels and many fine residences were among those undermined and badly damaged. Seventy families are homeless. The damage done to property is estimated at $1,000,000, most of it borne by Seabright and other points along the northern section of the New Jersey coast.

The gale at one time reached a velocity of 90 miles an hour.

Brother Visits Miss Brance.

Monticello, N. Y., Dec. 29.—Miss Adelaide M. Brance, who has been a voluntary prisoner in the county jail after her detention in connection with the death of Melvin H. Couch, was visited by her brother, H. I. Brance of Hartwick, N. Y. The meeting was most affectionate. Mr. Brance had not seen his sister in fourteen years and, until last Sunday, when she emerged from the office of the lawyer, had only occasionally received a letter from her. He has advised Miss Brance to seek rest in a sanitarium and is ready to give her all possible help.

1804 Dollar Is Found.

New Hoven, Conn., Dec. 27.—A silver dollar bearing the date 1804, understood to be quoted at $3,500 for collection purposes, was found here. William Sullivan, a laborer, excavating on the site of the ice rink for the Yale hockey team, turned over with his shovel an old jar which rested on a boulder seven feet below the surface of the street nearby. Under the bowl was a sliver snuff box made in Nuremberg, green with oxidization. In it was a United States silver dollar dated 1804, in good condition.

'CASCARETS" FOR LIVER; BOWELS

No sick headache, biliousness, bad taste or constipation by morning.

Get a 10-cent box.

Are you keeping your bowels, liver, and stomach clean, pure and fresh with Cascarets, or merely forcing a passageway every few days with Salts, Cathartic Pills, Castor Oil or Purgative Waters?

Stop having a bowel wash-day. Let Cascarets thoroughly cleanse and regulate the stomach, remove the sour and fermenting food and foul gases, take the excess bile from the liver and carry out of the system all the constipated waste matter and poisons in the bowels.

A Cascaret to-night will make you feel great by morning. They work while you sleep—never gripe, sicken or cause any inconvenience, and cost only 10 cents a box from your store. Millions of men and women take a Cascaret now and then and never have Headache, Biliousness, Coated Tongue, Indigestion, Sour Stomach or Constipation. Adv.

HORSE HAD TO KEEP GOING

Might Choose Its Own Time to Die, But Driver Selected Spot Where It Was to Fall.

A South Dakota congressman tells a story of the old coaching days, when a certain Pete McCoy, one of the most skilful of the old stage-drivers, operated a conveyance that made a circuit of Deadwood, Carbonate, Spearfish, and Bear Gulch. Pete was famous for his fast, furious, daring driving.

One day, the story runs, Pete tore into Carbonate on his usual dead run. Up to the "hotel" door clattered the stage. There, suddenly, as it stopt, one of the four horses fell dead.

"Kinder sudden, that, Pete," said a bystander.

"Nuthin' sudden about it," said Pete. "That hoss died at the top of the hill, ten miles back; but I wasn't goin' to let him down until I got to the reg'lar stoppin' place."—Lippincott's Magazine.

Testimonial From High Authority

Mrs. B. L. Wilson of Nashville, Tenn., is famed the world over for her wonderfully delicious cakes. They are shipped to all parts of the globe for special affairs where the best of cakes are demanded.

Mrs. Wilson has the distinction of baking Christmas cakes for the Presidents, in which she uses Calumet Baking Powder.

She states:

"To have complete success, with no failures, care should be used in the selection of Baking Powder."

Calumet is complimented with the following testimonial from her:

"Some little time ago I made a careful study and investigation of the baking powder subject and I feel fully repaid. I am firmly convinced from the results I have received that there is no baking powder to equal Calumet for wholesomeness and economy, and I also recommend Calumet Baking Powder for its never failing results."

Calumet also received the Highest Awards at the World's Pure Food Exposition, Chicago; Grand Prize and Gold Medal, Paris Exposition, 1912.

This will, without a doubt, prove interesting and very gratifying to the friends and customers of Calumet Baking Powder. It has always been found that Calumet is economical to use.—Adv.

Old Adam.

Little Henry, like many other little boys, was very fond of playing at being a railway train. He liked to pretend to be the engine and to dash around the house with a great noise of puffing and tooting.

The other day the stork brought Henry a sister.

He was taken in to see the baby and regarded her for a time with an expression of grave curiosity. Then his face lighted up.

"Now," said he, "I shall have somebody to be the tender, anyhow.—New York Evening Post.

His Contribution.

A little boy of five was invited to a children's party. The next day he was giving an account of the fun, and said that each of the little visitors had contributed either a song, a recitation, or music for the pleasure of the rest.

"Oh, poor little Jack!" said his mother. "How very unfortunate you could do nothing!"

"Yes, I could, mother," replied the young hopeful. "I stood up and said my prayers!"

NEW LANGUAGE for NORWEGIANS

WHEN 50 years ago Henrik Ibsen in "Peer Gynt"—that most remarkable of all his metrical works—held up to ridicule in the person of "Huhu" the language reformers of Norway, he little thought that the movement, then in its infancy, would develop into a national issue of such importance as to have brought about the downfall of a powerful administration, and in the accession to office of a liberal cabinet under the premiership of General Bratlie. Indeed, the last general election in Norway was fought mainly on this issue of language, and resulted in an overwhelming victory of the left party, which is committed to the reform of the vernacular.

Perhaps the word reform, used in Christiania, is misleading. For the measure now in process of adoption is not the revision of the existing language, namely, Danish, but the adoption of an entirely different one, known as the Landsmaal. It was invented toward 1850 by the eminent Norwegian philologist, Ivar Aasen, who, in its construction, embodied much of the ancient Norse of the Sagas, as well as some of the dialects of the remoter regions of the kingdom, where the peasantry have clung through the four centuries of Danish domination to the tongue spoken by their forbears in the days of the Vikings.

Employing these and other materials, adapting them to modern requirements, Ivar Aasen succeeded in evolving so melodious and so poetic a language that the vast majority of his countrymen, commencing with the rural population, have accepted it for their songs, their plays, their sermons, their schools, and their vernacular. It has caught their fancy; it appeals to their pride in the romantic past when the sway of the Norse Vikings extended over Scandinavia, northern Germany, Russia, and the greater portion of the British isles; and it has become identified in their eyes with Norwegian nationalism.

The spurious Danish—in which Ibsen wrote and which has been the official language of the Norwegians for more than 400 years—recalls to them those centuries of Danish oppression and persecution, when, robbed of her independence, Norway was ruled from Copenhagen, not even as a province, but as a colony, fit only for spoliation, exaction, and tyranny. Everything that serves to recall Danish domination is hateful in Norway. Indeed, his Danish birth is the only real cause of the unpopularity of King Haakon's sagacious and conscientious rule.

Early this year Norway will celebrate the centennial anniversary of her emancipation from Denmark, of the recovery of her independence as a separate kingdom with a constitution of her own, though united by dynastic ties with Sweden until 1905. It is proposed to signalize the national rejoicings in honor of the occasion by the legislative adoption of Ivar Aasen's Landsmaal as the official and national language of Norway. The government, an overwhelming majority of the Storthing, the press, and the bulk of the people have all determined upon the change, and a royal commission appointed jointly by crown, cabinet and parliament is now engaged in completing the necessary arrangements for the execution of the proclamation decreeing the new vernacular, which is to inaugurate the centennial.

The Emperor of Russia
King George of Great Britain
Emperor William of Germany
King Haakon of NORWAY
King Albert of Belgium
Emperor Franz-Joseph of Austria

It will be a remarkable and unique event. For, while there are plenty of instances of a government forcing its language upon provinces and dependencies acquired by conquest or statecraft against the wishes of their population, there has been no case until now, to my knowledge, of a people compelling its rulers to abandon the national language for an entirely new tongue. Ivar Aasen, its creator, already celebrated as a philologist, will from henceforth enjoy new and more lasting fame, and will occupy an isolated place in history, as the one man who invented and constructed a language, which so pleased and fascinated his countrymen that they relinquished the tongue that had been theirs for hundreds of years, to adopt his for official and national use.

Ivar Aasen, who was the son of a small peasant farmer, was born just a hundred years ago in the district of Sondmore, and was honored on his death, in 1896, with a great public funeral at Christiania, where a national memorial is about to be erected over his tomb.

There are but two things more to be mentioned in connection with this remarkable linguistic change in Norway. The first is that Landsmaal is phonetic in its spelling. The second is that its adoption as the national vernacular will present no difficulty. For, as I have mentioned above, it has been taught in schools for 20 and 30 years past—and in Norway everybody attends school, popular education being of an extremely high order. Moreover, the people have become so accustomed to it, and have developed such a liking for it, that it is they who forced its adoption by the state.

While this question of language has thus ceased to be a subject of political strife in Norway, it remains a fertile source of trouble almost everywhere else in the world. It has been so ever since the time, when, in the words of the Old Testament, the Almighty "confounded the language" of the builders of the Tower of Babel, "so that they might not understand one another's speech," thereby creating so much discord among them that they were compelled to abandon their impious undertaking. Here in the United States the trouble has been largely confined to the Roman Catholic church, the hierarchy of which has patriotically refused to countenance proposals of any ecclesiastical or educational character calculated to interfere with the Americanization of the immigrants and of their children. In Europe, however, the language problem continues nearly everywhere to constitute an important and disturbing political issue.

Particularly is this the case in Germany and in the Austro-Hungarian empire. The latter comprises some 16 or more distinct races, each at daggers drawn with the others, and with a language of its own, the preservation of which it regards as necessary to protect it from absorption by its neighbors, and from disappearance as a national entity. To such an extent is this question of language identified with that of nationalism in the dominions of Francis Joseph that his lieges are convinced that they cannot fight for the one without combating for the other.

Austria and Hungary have repeatedly, during the last decade, come almost to blows about this question of language, which has created more ill-feeling between these two moieties of the dual empire than anything else since the sanguinary Magyar insurrection of 1849. The Hungarians, who defray one-half of the expenses of the imperial army, demand that their language shall be used in lieu of German for the commands given those troops stationed in the Magyar kingdom. To this, neither the monarch, nor the Austrian government, has been willing to consent, realizing that any concession in the matter would lead to similar pretensions on the part of the Czechs in Bohemia, of the Croatians, of the Slovaks, of the Rumanians in Transylvania, of the Italians in the southern provinces, of the Poles in Galicia, and so along the whole gamut.

Each of these races entertain the same nationalist aspirations as the Hungarians, and the quarrels which have taken place about this question of language during the last quarter of a century have done more than anything else to discredit parliamentary institutions in the duel empire and to render legislative government well nigh impossible.

Nor is this strife on the subject of languages confined within the limits of Austria-Hungary. It affects very seriously the foreign relations of the latter. Formerly the Finns were renowned for their unimpeachable loyalty to the Russian crown, and it used to be a boast that no citizens of this northern grand duchy were ever to be found in revolutionary or nihilist ranks. This condition of affairs has been radically changed during the last 15 years or so by the endeavors of the St. Petersburg government to Russianize the language of the population, compelling the use of Russian instead of Finnish not only in official, administrative, legislative, and judicial procedure and communications, but even in the schools, in the churches, and in the everyday life of the people. A similar process of Russianization has been carried on in the German-speaking provinces of the west and in Russian Poland, the idea being to gradually crush out of existence nationalist particularism and to weld the various non-Muscovite races of the czar's empire into a wholly Russian homogeneous unit. Thus far the experiment has proved a failure, and has only served, as also in Finland, to develop a greater hostility toward everything Russian and a more passionate attachment to [illegible]

It is the same in Germany, where the imperial government has for decades past been striving its utmost to substitute the German language for Polish in the province of Posen, of German for Danish in the duchies of Schleswig and of Holstein, and of German in lieu of French in Alsace and Lorraine. The agents of the government intrusted with this work, rendered impatient by opposition and resistance, resort, as in Russia, to all sorts of harsh measures to attain their ends, measures that must appear to the people of this country as partaking of the most intolerable tyranny and cruel oppression, especially when young children are punished for declining to repeat in school their prayers and their catechism in any other language than that in which they learned them at their mother's knee.

Belgium is literally torn asunder by the rival claims of the Flemish and the French speaking provinces for the official supremacy of their respective languages. Of the population of near 8,000,000, 52 per cent. speak Flemish and the remaining 48 per cent. French, and each moiety insists that its language should be the national tongue. So bitter has the fight become that the king has even been called upon in parliament at Brussels to consent to the partition of the country into two separate and independent states, the one embracing the Walloon, or French-speaking provinces, and the other the Flemish provinces, each having its own autonomous form of government, and united only by dynastic ties, in the person of the sovereign. This fight about the languages in Belgium is a perpetual source of political discussion, invading every form and walk in life, and has contributed more than anything else to obstruct legislation, and to interfere with the progress of this amazingly rich little kingdom.

In Greece a few years ago there were sanguinary riots throughout the country, notably between those who favored the modern Greek version of the Scriptures, and those who clung to the ancient Greek language, where the Bible was concerned. Even Great Britain has had her troubles in connection with the question of language. A short time before Joseph Chamberlain retired from the secretaryship of state for the colonies, he stirred up such a hornets' nest at Malta, by some unpopular decrees concerning the language to be used in official matters on the island, that he was forced to rescind it, this being the only instance in his long and masterful career at the colonial department of his having to beat a retreat. Moreover, to this day the rival claims of the Taal, or Dutch patois, spoken in South Africa, and of English, to official and administrative supremacy, remain a source of dissensions, which are not without bitterness. They every now and then become acute, and seriously interfere with the reconciliation of the Boer element to British rule.

While it is impossible to refrain from admiring the liberal policy which the British government has adopted in South Africa in relation to this problem of languages, it must be a source of amazement that Germany, Russia, and other European powers should be so blind to the lessons of history in this particular connection.

FUNNY TALES

"Hang it!" said Oppman to his daughter. "You made a great selection at the public library! Of the three books you brought me one is about an orphan asylum, another about an old folks' home and the third concerns a pesthouse."

"But they're good books," insisted Julia Oppman.

"I don't want to read about a pesthouse, and I have all I can do keeping out of the poorhouse myself, so I don't care to read about it," growled her father. "Can't you get me a cheerful sort of book?"

"Now, papa," objected Violet Oppman, "you always read the books first and then tell us about them before we have a chance to read them ourselves. That spoils the book."

"Yes, he does," assented Mrs. Oppman. "He tears the book all to pieces and destroys our appetite for it by telling us that both the hero and heroine are fools."

"Well, they mostly are," said Oppman.

"That pesthouse story that you are growling about is really a funny story. It——"

"A what?" demanded Oppman. "Yes, I suppose it is. So is the story about the two old folks walking hand in hand to the poorhouse."

"Well, there are quaint little things in it, and the orphan story is so fascinating," said Mrs. Oppman. "The little girl reconciles an unhappy pair, and it all turns out well."

"Well," explained Oppman, "I didn't read as far as that. I can't stand to read about orphan children getting abused. I suppose that was a funny yarn about the girl who moved to town to get work, and there was an elm tree that she fell in love with, and when it was cut down she died. Where was the joke in that?"

"Oh," said Violet, "that was a sweetly sad story. But the pest house story is uproariously funny all the way through."

"I never noticed it. They were in the pesthouse and that institution overlooked the graveyard. The idea of being separated from your family and put there to contemplate the graveyard strikes me as anything but funny!"

"Well, if you had just read a little further you would have come to the fun. The smallpox patients organized a baseball team and played every afternoon. They called themselves 'The Pesthouse Pippins.' They challenged all comers, and there wasn't a team in the state that dared tackle them!"

"[illegible] that book!" cried Oppman.

Vehicle Made to Run on Ice by Gasoline Power.

A LIFE FOR A LIFE

By FRANK FILSON.

Ivan Basilieff, the Russian consul in a city of the middle west, paced his library incessantly, listening to the murmurs of the doctors' voices in the next room. His only daughter, Olga, had been ill for weeks of a mysterious disease, which had slowly wasted her until there seemed no chance of saving her life. Olga was seventeen, and, since her mother's death, she had been the apple of his eye.

The consul was just about to rush distractedly into the room where the consultation of specialists was being held, when the door opened and they filed in.

"You can save her?" cried the consul eagerly.

"There is only one man can save her," answered the senior doctor. "That is Arnheim."

"The Jewish specialist of the East side," explained another. "He is the only man in America who has made a study of this rare disease. I think we had better call him into consultation."

"Do," said the consul, wearily. "And tell him I shall not consider the expense."

"I should not mention the expense," advised the senior surgeon. "Doctor Arnheim gives most of his time to the poor free."

"As you will," muttered the consul. "Telephone him to come immediately."

But when they got Arnheim on the telephone, they listened to a brief message which, when repeated, caused the consul to explode with anger.

"Go to him!" he exclaimed. "Why should I go to him? Isn't my daughter's life worth more than the lives of all the thousands of wretches who swarm in these parts? Tell him to come at once, and I'll pay him double what he could make in a month."

But the doctors could not get into communication with Arnheim again, and finally, fretting and fuming, the consul ordered his automobile and was driven down to those parts which he had rightly characterized as "unsavory."

He Was in a Different Mood Now.

The East side of most middle western cities is the least pretentious in appearance, and the squalor of the streets through which M. Basilieff passed sent his memory whirling back among the slums of Minsk. The consul had been governor of that city long before—fifteen years before, in fact, and he had then been in high favor with his government, and a far more responsible person than he was today. He had had many hatreds; he had hated Catholics, Armenians, heretics, and Jews with impartial fervor. He had secretly instigated the abominable Jewish massacres which had sent fifty thousand homeless men and women flying to America for refuge, after their children, fathers, mothers, friends had been slaughtered before their eyes. Among these had been Arnheim, then a poor lad with a penchant for medicine which he could not gratify until he reached the free shores of America. That, perhaps, explained the doctor's gruffness; but how was Basilieff to know that?

The consul got out of his carriage and entered the house in which the doctor lived. The door was always open. Through it that day had passed two hundred of the poor, whom Arnheim treated with impartial kindness. When the consul sought to pass into his office an attendant politely restrained him.

"Say that I am M. Basilieff, his imperial majesty's consul here," exclaimed the visitor angrily.

"Everybody must take his turn," replied the attendant, suavely.

Because he loved his daughter more than his pride, M. Basilieff stewed in the anteroom for two long hours, while those who were waiting passed in before him. At last, when his turn came, he was shown in. Doctor Arnheim, bland, civil, but sharp, bade him sit down.

Almost humbly—for he recognized that here his rank availed him nothing—the consul complied, and soon he was describing his daughter's illness as though the East side doctor were one of the imperial physicians of the court. Arnheim listened in silence.

"When can you come?" pleaded the consul.

"Now," answered Arnheim.

After dismissing his patients, Arnheim led the way out of the house and stepped into the consul's automobile. Twenty minutes later the two men were standing in the room where the sick girl lay. Around her were grouped the famous physicians, helpless in the presence of this rare disease. The consul left Arnheim there and went back to his library.

Back and forth he paced again, waiting for the verdict. But he was in a different mood now, for his experiences of the past three hours had humbled him, and for the first time he had begun to realize that humanity is greater than the stamp it bears. When at last the doctors entered again he came forward almost humbly to meet them; and instead of his old, arrogant demeanor, there was submissiveness in his inquiry:

"She will live," said Arnheim, quietly.

It was explained that the operation would have to be performed almost immediately. Arrangements were made for this to be done in the consul's house. After that, while Olga hovered between life and death, Arnheim was almost an inmate of the consul's house.

At last the day arrived when the crisis was past, and the consul took Arnheim by the hands and, in Russian fashion, kissed him on either cheek.

"I do not know how to thank you or to remunerate you, except with thanks and gratitude," he said. "But you must name your fee, Doctor Arnheim. No matter what you ask, it shall be yours." His eyes filled with tears. "My daughter is all I have in the world," he said. "If you have a child, Doctor Arnheim—but you are a bachelor, I understand."

"A widower," said Arnheim. "Well, M. Basilieff, since you wish to remunerate me as best you can, let there be no fee in this case."

The consul was almost indignant.

"But you must certainly accept compensation for your work," he said. "Putting the matter upon the lowest plane, you have lost a good many patients and have given me much of your valuable time. You must be remunerated."

"I have been remunerated," replied the doctor, and the change in his expression was so startling that the consul looked at him in amazement.

"Do you remember the massacre at Minsk sixteen years ago, M. Basilieff?" asked Doctor Arnheim, a strange light coming into his eyes. "You were governor of Minsk. They said you could have stopped it."

"Well?" inquired the consul haughtily.

"My little son was slain by your soldiers," said the doctor. "I vowed to be revenged on you. For fifteen years I have borne the load of hatred in my heart. Now it is gone. A life for a life—your daughter's for my son—the living for the dead. Good morning."

Next moment he was gone.

PROPER LIGHT IN FACTORIES

Satisfactory Illumination Will Be Found Actually to Lessen the Cost of Production.

Good illumination in industrial plants is being realized as a factor in the cost of production. To insure a satisfactory intensity of light on the work from a general overhead system of lighting, it is in most cases essential to provide light from several directions so that all sides of the objects viewed may be properly illuminated, says a writer in the Electrical World, and so that, if one lamp burns out, or the light is intercepted either by the operator's body or by parts of machinery, the resulting decrease in intensity will not be serious. A requirement of even greater importance than sufficient quantity of light of uniform intensity of illumination is that the intensity shall be constant. A flickering light produces the same effect as when one passes from a dark room into bright sunshine, bringing muscular fatigue and nervous reaction, which cause discomfort and pain. In addition to supplying the proper light on the work, a well-designed system of illumination should provide for some light on adjacent objects and on shafting and belting as well as on the walls and ceiling. From the psychological standpoint, bright walls and ceiling lend an air of cheerfulness and wide-awakeness to a room which is wanting where the work only is illuminated.

Sold Again.

For ten long but blissful years they had walked along the path of love; but as yet the lovesick youth had never mentioned about their getting married. Courtship is very charming, but when there does not seem to be altar rails at the end of it girls naturally begin to lose interest in the game.

Anyhow, Jane thought it time that the marriage day was fixed, so she threw out a gentle hint to her lover by way of encouraging him. Encouragement, she thought, was all the dear fellow wanted.

"Nathaniel," she whispered, coyly, "they're saying we're going to be married soon."

"Are they, though?" answered the stolid swain. "What a joke it'll be on them when they find out we ain't!"

Seasoned Youth.

"Remember," said the severe parent, "that if you disobey me I shall punish you."

"I shall endeavor not to disobey you," replied the youth. "But I must remind you that any punishment you might have in contemplation would exert very little influence on a football player with my record."

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

The Duluth Herald gets out a better Sunday addition than any of the twin city dailies.

The Great Northern Railway laid off fifteen brakeman at Crookston this week. Luck of business is given as the reason.

CONTRACT LET FOR RLY. BRIDGE.

The Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway Company has let the contract for the construction of a railway bridge arcross Thief River. Mr. Halseth, who secured the contract, is an experienced bridge builder from Donaldson. He will move his family to this city and expects to be ready with a crew of men to commence on the construction work immediately after the holidays.

The bridge will be built across Thief River at a point about 300 feet northwest of the bridge known as Long's bridge.—T. R. Falls Times.

There comes a time to every man no matter what his position in society, no matter how much money he has, when he feels the need of comradeship when he feels the need of society. Riches melt and fade, prosperity takes wings and leaves the disappointed in the depths of dispair, but the friendly hand, the touch of elbows, the soft spoken word, these are invaluable as they are valueless in the eyes of those who for a season are basking the sunshine of riches and gratified desires.

But when the shadows lengthen and the sunshine fades, when the evil days come, when fate has its little jest with those who have been at the top of the ladder, it is the friendly hand, the tender word, which goes so far toward alleviating sorrow and suffering, which goes so far toward making the world a fit place to live in.

There is not a stage in human life when a man can afford to be indifferent to the good will of those about him. There is not a man alive today who knows what the morrow is going to bring forth. There is not a man rich enough to purchase one fleeting breath from the fate which is pursuing him. There is not a man alive who can stay for a second the inevitable end of each and all of us. Then "Why should the spirit of mortal be proud.—Ex.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE POSTOFFICE.

By the way, a word of congratulation and praise to the postoffice, not only locally but throughout the country, is due.

With practically no more men or equipment than it had last year, the postoffice department in all its branches has stood off the shock of the parcel post Christmas business nobly. At least three times the usual holiday business has been handled by the postoffice, and very little was left undelivered Christmas night. What little there is left can easily be blamed to the failure of many patrons to do their Christmas shipping early.

This greatest of public functions, and the closest to the people and the most useful, has splendidly withstood the addition of the parcel post at Christmas time, and this is the most trying test imaginable. To the department as a whole, to the local postoffice, and to the employes of the department and the local office, a word of sincere praise is due.—The Duluth Herald.

To Find Your Collar Button.

Here are two sure ways to find a collar button that has dropped on the floor and rolled away where you can't see it:

Rule 1.—Walk around the room in your bare feet. You will soon find the collar button embedded in your heel.

Rule 2.—Put on a pair of heavy boots and walk around the room. You will soon step on the collar button and mash it flat.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Puzzled.

Half an hour after Mrs. Richly had given her new maid an order she became uneasy and went to investigate. "Well, Mary, what has detained you? Have you found my Keats as requested?" "Lor, mum," Mary apologized, "I was just comin' back to ask what is a Keats."

HE ASKED FOR A COT.

And He Got a Cot, or What They Call a Cot, in Scotland.

A resident of Terre Haute was traveling in Scotland and met a congenial acquaintance on the train. The newfound friend insisted that he be permitted to show the Indianian the best hotel in the small place where they were both stopping. When they got to the hotel it was full. As the Indiana man was only going to stay one night, he said he was not particular but would sleep any place.

It was finally agreed that he should sleep in the hotel parlor. But the lounge proved too hard. So he called the porter.

"I can't sleep on this lounge. Bring me a cot, will you, my boy?" he asked.

"A cot, sir? Did you say a cot, sir?"

"Yes, a cot. I can't sleep on this."

"Did you say a cot, sir?"

"Yes. You put a cot in here for me. I'm going out, but shall return presently."

When on his return he opened the door to what he thought was the parlor he was amazed to find a cradle near his suit case. He summoned the porter.

"Boy, I asked you to bring me a cot. That is not a cot. That is a baby's bed."

"No, sir; that is a cot, sir."

"Well, but I can't sleep in that. What I want is a cot—a long frame, you know, with springs on it," at the same time measuring with his hands.

"Oh, I see, sir," replied the boy. "You don't want a cot, sir. What you want is a stretcher, sir."—Indianapolis News.

WANTED—A RIDER AGENT

IN EACH TOWN and district to ride and exhibit a sample Latest Model "Ranger" bicycle furnished by us. Our agents everywhere are making money fast. Write for full particulars and special offer at once.

NO MONEY REQUIRED until you receive and approve of your bicycle. We ship to anyone anywhere in the U. S. without a cent deposit in advance, prepay freight, and allow TEN DAYS' FREE TRIAL during which time you may ride the bicycle and put it to any test you wish. If you are then not perfectly satisfied or do not wish to keep the bicycle ship it back to us at our expense and you will not be out one cent.

FACTORY PRICES We furnish the highest grade bicycles it is possible to make at one small profit above actual factory cost. You save $10 to $25 middlemen's profits by buying direct of us and have the manufacturer's guarantee behind your bicycle. DO NOT BUY a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone at any price until you receive our catalogues and learn our unheard of factory prices and remarkable special offers to rider agents.

YOU WILL BE ASTONISHED when you receive our beautiful catalogue and study our superb models at the wonderfully low prices we can make you this year. We sell the highest grade bicycles for less money than any other factory. We are satisfied with $1.00 profit above factory cost.

BICYCLE DEALERS, you can sell our bicycles under your own name plate at double our prices. Orders filled the day received.

SECOND HAND BICYCLES. We do not regularly handle second hand bicycles, but usually have a number on hand taken in trade by our Chicago retail stores. These we clear out promptly at prices ranging from $3 to $8 or $10. Descriptive bargain lists mailed free.

COASTER-BRAKES, single wheels, imported roller chains and pedals, parts, repairs and equipment of all kinds at half the regular retail prices.

$10.00 Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof Self-healing Tires A SAMPLE PAIR TO INTRODUCE, ONLY $4.80

The regular retail price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but to introduce we will sell you a sample pair for $4.80 (cash with order $4.55).

NO MORE TROUBLE FROM PUNCTURES

NAILS, Tacks, or Glass will not let the air out. A hundred thousand pairs sold last year.

DESCRIPTION: Made in all sizes. It is lively and easy riding, very durable and lined inside with a special quality of rubber, which never becomes porous and which closes up small punctures without allowing the air to escape. We have hundreds of letters from satisfied customers stating that their tires have only been pumped up once or twice in a whole season. They weigh no more than an ordinary tire, the puncture resisting qualities being given by several layers of thin, specially prepared fabric on the tread. The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.

Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D" also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.

We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires, you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.

IF YOU NEED TIRES don't buy any kind at any price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof tires on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for our big Tire and Sundry Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.

DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it NOW.

A Lesson In Natural History.

An indulgent grandfather was entertaining his grandchildren by turning the leaves of a book on animals. Coming to the kangaroo, he called their attention to its peculiarities and especially to its enormous tail. Passing on after awhile he thought he would try them to see how much they remembered of this talk about the kangaroo. He asked, "What animal has the biggest tail?" After a moment's thought one little girl spoke up. "I know, a snake; it's all tail." — Indianapolis News.

Woman's Love of Jewels.

Even in the stone age woman was fond of jewels. But it was man, the brutal master, who wore them. The heavy necklace that descended upon his breast was the emblem of his superiority and power. Even before he had progressed so far as to cover himself with the skin of the stag he wore a necklace of shells, of teeth of animals or glittering flint. The elegant dame or demoiselle who rolls by in her limousine is not so distant a relative of the cave man as she may try to appear. She likes jewels better than dress since each season we see her more and more bejeweled and less and less clothed. The joy of jewels is of the same infantile quality with the coquette of today that it was in the early barbaric times —a thread of metal upon which are strung some shining pebbles, a thread of silk over which are placed some small round concretions of lime found rolling in the liquid of a diseased oyster!—Le Bresil Economique.

Power of a Great Wave.

The remains of an excursion steamer may be seen in a bayfield 300 feet above the lake of Loen, in Norway. This oddly placed wreck is the sole relic of a terrible landslide which took place in 1906, when the whole side of a mountain suddenly slipped into the lake, raising a great wave more than 300 feet high, which drowned everybody living along the shores, more than sixty people perishing. The steamer, which was moored on the lake at the time, was carried on the crest of the wave over a perpendicular cliff and deposited, as already stated, more than 300 feet above the normal level of the water, more than a quarter of a mile away from its anchorage. It is a torn and battered wreck, every bit of woodwork has been wrenched off, and the twisted steel work testifies to the force of the wave which cast it ashore.—Wide World Magazine.

Bumped the Bishop.

Bishop Montgomery once enjoyed the strangest of episcopal rides. While traveling in China he covered forty five miles in two days in a wheelbarrow. "Bishop Scott and I," he writes "were on one barrow; Lanchester followed on a second, the luggage in a third. We did it luxuriously, with three men to each barrow—one in front, one behind on the handles and a third with a rope in front of all. Are there springs to the barrow? Certainly not. It would be no fun if there were. Bumps? Of course. On the first day we calculated we had 25,000 of them—the best were caused by drops of six inches or more from one stone to another. I got quite used to them and found I could sleep stretched luxuriously on my mattress."

The Game of Golf.

On the notice board of a Liverpool golf club, says the Liverpool Post, appear the following verses typewritten on the club notepaper:

Swat the ball and walk a mile.
Swat the ball. It's worth your while.
Walk a mile and swat the ball.
Walk some more. Nor is that all.
Swat the ball and walk—what then?
Swat the ball and walk again.
After that you walk and—what?
Once again the ball you swat.
Swat the ball and walk still more.
Keep on swatting as before.
When as far as this you've got
Swat and walk, then walk and swat.

Golf, of course, has been defined as a good walk spoiled, and a low comedian once described the game thusly: "You hit a ball as far as you can, and if you find it the same day you have won."

Kean's Suggestion.

When Charles Kean was playing the part of Richard the Third his fearful grimaces almost frightened the other actors out of their wits. One night a new man took the character of the sentinel who awoke Richard. When asked, "Who is there?" he should have taken up the cue with the words: "'Tis I, my lord. The village clock hath thrice proclaimed the hour of morn." But Kean's facial contortions threw the sentinel into such a fit of stage fright that he forgot most of his words, stammering, "'Tis I, my lord, 'tis I, my lord; the—the village cock!" He repeated this three or four times, so that when Kean said, "Then why on earth don't you crow?" the audience was convulsed with laughter.

Something Wrong.

"Who shall I say is asking for him?" inquired central of the man in the booth.

"Mr. O'Cohen."

"Mr. Who?"

Poetry.

"A famous educator says everybody ought to read a little poetry every day."

"I agree with him. If most people would read poetry every day perhaps there wouldn't be so many trying to write it."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

SUFFER IN SILENCE.

Animals Bear the Most Intense Pain With Little Outcry.

One of the most pathetic things is the manner in which the animal kingdom endures suffering. Take horses, for instance, in battle. After the first shock of a wound they make no sound. They bear the pain with a mute, wondering endurance, and if at night you hear a wild groan from the battlefield it comes from their loneliness.

The dog will carry a broken leg for days wistfully, but uncomplainingly.

The cat, stricken with stick or stone, or caught in some trap from which it knows its way to freedom, crawls to some secret spot and bears in silence pain which we could not endure.

Sheep and cattle meet the thrust of the butcher's knife without a sound, and even common poultry endure intense agony without complaint.

The dove, shot unto death, flies to some faroff bough, and as it dies the silence is unbroken save for the patter on the leaves of its own life blood.

The wounded deer speeds to some thick brake, and in pitiful submission waits for death.

The eagle, struck in midair, fights to the last against the fatal summons. There is no moan or sound of pain, and the defiant look never fades from its eyes until the lids finally close over them.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Lightning Cures.

Some have had physical reasons to rejoice that they had been struck by lightning. De Quatrefages mentions the case of a telegraph employee at Strassburg who was struck senseless and remained paralyzed until the next day, but thereafter enjoyed better health than ever before. In Martinique a M. Roalde was deprived by lightning of the use of his limbs for three hours, but, having previously been a man of weak health, was much stronger from that time on. Several authors refer to cases in which rheumatism was cured by lightning. And in this respect also trees seem to be as men. Arago saw a poplar, one of an avenue of 1,500 near Tours, which, having been struck, developed such vigor that its trunk soon far surpassed in dimensions those of all its neighbors.

Elephants' Teeth.

The elephant has no cutting teeth, like most animals, but only a series of molars. These molars or grinders as they wear away gradually move forward in the jaw, and the remnant of the tooth, when the surface is completely destroyed, is cast out in front. The same molar can thus be replaced as many as eight times. The tusks, which are only enormously elongated teeth, can be renewed only once. This wearing process and the ejection of the stump of the tooth go on very slowly during the life of the elephant. Only one or two teeth at a time are in use or in view in each jaw. There are always other teeth waiting to pass forward and begin their work, although there is a limit to this succession, for, when the last has come into use and been worn down, the elephant can no longer chew his food and must die of starvation, if he has not already succumbed to old age.

The Poet's Banknotes.

In "The Tragedy of Isabella II." it is said that the unfortunate Spanish queen, blessed with generous impulses, was exceedingly charitable. Unfortunately she had no notion of the value of money and would want to give away sums out of all proportion to the occasion. Once the queen had commanded a large grant in aid to a man of letters, and the steward, in order to give her a just idea of its magnitude, decided to present the donation in the form of many banknotes of small value—enough of them to paper the walls of the boudoir. Isabella was startled—she would never have believed, she said, that there were so many banknotes in the world. "But no matter," she concluded. "Since banknotes are so easy to get, it is quite proper to send the poor poet plenty of them."

CHAPTER I.

The Prophecy.

Half a dozen high, little French voices floated shrilly out into the garden, on a sunshiny morning of 1820 from the great entry of an old farmhouse in the valley under the Jura mountains. The grandmother, sitting white-capped in the center of the hubbub, heard one more willingly than the others, for not only was Francois her best loved, but also the story he asked for was the story she liked to tell.

Smiling, the grandmother began: "You must know, my children, that it was on a day in the month of May, in the year 1813, that he came. You, Lucie, and you, Pierre, and Marie were not born, only Francois and Tomas. Francois was the older—not quite three years old. The mother had gone to care for your Aunt Lucie, who was ill, and I kept the house for your father. It was the year of the great conscription, when the emperor took all the men to fight, not only the strong ones, but the boys, and the old and infirm, if they might but drag themselves at the tail of a regiment. So the few men who were not under the flag were sorely needed by their families, for it was necessary, if the women and children were not to starve, that some should stay to work in the fields. Your father was of the few who had escaped in our village of Vicques.

"One morning a man appeared in the village and said that Napoleon would pass this way within a few hours.

"Outside I heard the neighbors calling the same two words—'Napoleon comes'—one called it to another. If the trumpet of the angel sounded the end of the world, they could not have had more fear. Then your father kissed me, and kneeled and held you, Francois, and Tomas, in his arms, and I saw tears, but he was brave—but yes. 'Courage, little mother,' he said, 'for me and for the babies. Courage.'

"And at that your father, who was my little lad once, you know, my dears, had gone, and I stood with an ache where my heart should have been, and for a moment I was stupid and could not think.

"As I stood so, like a blow there was a rush of galloping horses in a shower of noise down the street, and my heart stopped, for the horses drew up at this house. So that I was still in the middle of the floor when the door opened.

"It opened, that door there, and against the light I saw men crowding in the entry. They wore uniforms of bright colors, and swords hung at their sides, and on their heads were hats with trimmings of gold. Then I saw —Napoleon. With a step toward me he spoke in a kind voice, half smiling.

" 'Madame,' he said, 'will you let us use this room and this table for an hour? You shall not be disturbed in your work.'

"I made my courtesy to these great gentlemen as I had been taught, and I found myself saying quite easily to his majesty the emperor, as easily as if I talked to Monsieur le Cure, to whom I was accustomed, that he was welcome; that I would serve him gladly if he wished to command me. And then I left them. I went into the kitchen and began to get dinner, but I was so dazed that I could not seem to make the soup as usual. When, suddenly, I heard a child cry, and with no thought then but of my babies, I flew to the door of the great room and stood looking, for I could not pass the sentinel.

"Among the officers in their uniforms there lay on the floor little Francois in his night-dress, and all the officers looked at him and laughed. The child, sleeping in the farther room, had waked at the voices and had climbed down from his crib and toddled out to see. The glitter of the uniforms must have pleased him, and as they all bent over the papers on the table he had pulled at the sword of one whom I afterward knew to be the great Marshal Ney. He wore a dark coat all heavy with gold lace, my children, and white pantaloons and high shining black boots, and across his breast a scarlet ribbon. He sat next the emperor. The marshal, turning sharply at the tug, knocked the little one over. It was then Francois cried out.

"Napoleon himself who spoke as I peered under the sentinel's arm. He shook his finger at his officer.

" 'Marshal, Marshal,' he cried, 'are you not too quick to overthrow so young a soldier, so full of love for arms?'

"The emperor seemed to joke, for he laughed a little, yet there was a sound in his voice as if some part was serious. He turned sharply to the mayor. 'What is the child's name?'

"The mayor was our friend and knew the babies. 'Francois Beaupre, sire,' he answered tremblingly.

"The emperor gave a short nod. 'Make him kneel,' he said. 'Marshal, your sword.'

"It was still for a moment, and all the officers stood up silent, and then the emperor took the marshal's sword and struck the baby's shoulder a light blow with the flat of it.

" 'Rise Chevalier Francois Beaupre,' he said clearly, and in the pause he added, with a look in his eyes as if one gazed forward: 'Some day, perhaps, a marshal of France under another Bonaparte.' "

CHAPTER II.

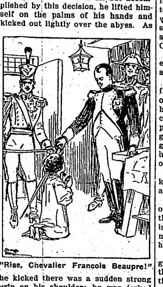
The Stranger.

On an afternoon in July in the year of 1820, Francois, being ten years old and a dreamer, came alone through the gate and sat down with his short legs dangling over an ancient wall, fifteen feet sheer down. He sat there, quite comfortable and secure, and kicked his heels, and thought of his brilliant future, and also of the story of the great dog and the treasure. The tradition ran that ages back, in the time of Caesar, fifty years after Christ, a Roman governor in this Gallic province had built a formidable castle on this hill outside the village. The castle had great granaries to hold the grain which the governor tortured from the peasants and sent to Rome to sell. So he grew rich by oppression, and the gold wrung from the people he piled in cellars deep in his castle. When it came to be a great amount he sent far to the north and got a huge dog, and this dog he trained to a terrible fierceness, so that anyone coming near in the long underground corridors where he guarded the treasure was sure to be torn in pieces, except always the governor.

For years things went on in this way, the governor grinding the peasants, and the giant dog guarding him and his treasure, till at last there came a thunderbolt—the governor was sent for to come to Rome to give an account of the riches which he had kept from the emperor. He had to go, but he left the dog in charge, and the night after he was gone the peasantry gathered and set fire to the chateau and burned it to the ground, and the dog and the treasure were buried in it, and there they are to this day. The people of Vicques believe that if a man will go to dig that treasure and will stay till midnight, that at twelve exactly a colossal dog will rise from the ruined stones and come, breathing flames; in his mouth will be the key of the treasure-vault, and back of him will stand the ghost of the Roman governor wrapped in white, his face covered. And if the man will be bold enough to take the key from the flaming mouth, then dog and governor will vanish in a clap of thunder, and in front of the daring one will rise the door of the treasure-vault, and he may turn the key and go in and help himself.

Francois considered, and, feeling no fear in his soul, decided that he was the man destined to take the key out of the dog's mouth and get the treasure, which he would at once transfer intact to his mother. He had no need for treasure; there were things more important. It was for him to become a marshal of France. Napoleon had said so; it must be so; but he should like, on the way to this goal, to face the dog and take the key and give his mother the treasure.

In the gaiety of the thought, and feeling both ambitious all but accomplished by this decision, he lifted himself on the palms of his hands and kicked out lightly over the abyss. As he kicked there was a sudden strong grip on his shoulder; he was jerked backward and rolled on the grass.



"Rise, Chevalier Francois Beaupre!"

"Are you tired of life at this age then?" a strident voice demanded, and Francois lay on his back and regarded, wondering, at ease, the bronzed lined face of a big man standing over him. Francois smiled; then laughed with assurance of the other's friendliness up into the strange man's face. He got to his feet and stood.

"No, m'sieur," he said politely. "I was only pleased at thinking what I am going to be some day."

"Ah! Is it permitted to ask what magnificence it is that you are to be?"

"Certainly it is permitted, m'sieur," Francois answered in his courageous, courteous way. "I shall one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte."

The stranger watched him, astonished, and then he laid his hand on the slim shoulder in its homespun blouse, and his grave voice was gentle. "My child, be careful how you say words like those; you may get your father into trouble. It is a good belief to keep in one's heart, and you and I may yet shout 'Vive l'Empereur' for a Napoleon again. Yes, who knows? But I must go on. Good day, my friend, the marshal."

CHAPTER III.

Without Fear.

The gilder was at work gilding the great ball on top of the church steeple. Every twenty years this had to be done, and it was an event in the village. Moreover, it was dangerous, and, like all dangers, fascinating.

The boys of Vicques stood in groups in the street with their heads bent back, watching the tiny figure of a man that crept up an invisible ladder far in the air, lashed to the side of the steeple. Up and up it went, like a fly, crawling on the fleche, and there was a sinking feeling in each boy's stomach which was delightful, to think how at any moment that creeping black spot which was the gilder might fall down, down, and be dashed to pieces.

Achille Dufour suggested, "Even Francois would not dare climb that ladder to the ball. Dare you?"

The great brown eyes of Francois turned about the group; the boys waited eagerly for his answer. It was always this one who led into the dangerous places; always this one who went a bit further when the others' courage failed.

"I dare," said Francois. Then the dark heads came together in an uneasy mass, and there was whispering.

At the dinner-hour that day several mothers of the village remarked that their small lads were restless, not intent as usual on the black bread and the soup of chopped vegetables and the green beans—all anxious to finish and get away. Only the mother of Francois, however, reasoned from this that mischief was brewing. When the slim, wiry, little figure slipped from the table and out through the open door, she rose and followed and stood in the great entry watching him race across the field toward the church. He veered but once in his straight path—to turn to the Prilpoteaux cottage, where the gilder lodged while in Vicques.

"How soon will one be at work up there again?" he asked through the window of Auguste Philpoteaux sitting at his dinner, and the man answered good-naturedly:

"It may be in half an hour, my boy, Not sooner." And Francois raced on.

By this time a boy here and a boy there had stolen from their dinner tables and were gathering in groups down the street, but the elders paid no attention. Francois disappeared into the church; the boys began to grow breathless.

"It will take some minutes for the stairs," one said, and they waited. Two minutes, three, perhaps five; something rose out of the trap-door leading to the platform from which the steeple sprang—a figure, looking very small so far up above them. Instantly it attached itself, like a crawling fly, to the side of the steeple; it moved upward. Henri Dufour, below in the street, jumped as a hand grippad his arm. He looked up frightened at La Claire.

"Is that my Francois?" she demanded sternly, but the boy did not need to answer.

With that, by degrees people came from the cottages as at some mysterious warning and stood silent, afraid to breathe, watching the little figure creeping up, up the dizzy narrowing peak of the church steeple. A rider galloped down the road; seeing the groups, he pulled in his bay horse and his eyes followed the upward glance of the whole village.

"Who is it?" he flung at the nearest knot of peasants; his voice was abrupt and commanding.

The men pulled off their caps, and one answered respectfully: "It is little Francois Beaupre, my seigneur; it is a child who has no fear; he is almost at the top, but we dread it when he descends."

"Mon dieu!" the man on horseback growled. "If he looks down he is lost; the lad is a born hero or a born lunatic."

The crawling spot up there showed dark in the sunlight against the new gilding of the ball. It stopped; the blot was fixed for a second; another second. From the crowd rose gasps, and excited broken sentences.

"He has the vertigo! He is lost!"

The dark blot clung against the gilding. Then suddenly it moved, began to make a slow way downward, and a long sigh, like a ripple on water, ran through the ranks of people. No one spoke; all the eyes watched the little figure slip down, down the unseen ladder in the air. At last it was at the bottom; it disappeared into the trapdoor. Every one began to talk volubly at once; a woman cried for joy, then a child spoke in a high voice.

"See," she said shrilly, "the mother of Francois goes to meet him!"

Le Claire was far down the street, gliding toward that church door which was under the steeple. As she reached it the little lad came out, his face flushed, his eyes shining with excitement and triumph. She took his hand silently, hardly looking at him, and turned so, quietly, without a word of either joy or reproof, her face impassive. She had got her boy again from the dead, it seemed to Claire, and those first moments were beyond words or embraces. To touch his warm hand was enough. The man on the bay horse, trotting slowly along, saw the meeting.

"It is a woman out of the common, that one," he spoke aloud. "She rules herself and the boy." And the boy looked up as he came and smiled and tugged at his cap with the hand which his mother did not hold.

"Good morning, m'sieur," he said with friendliness, and the rider stared.

"Sacre bleu!" he flung back in his strong sudden voice. "It is my friend, the marshal. Was it you, then, glued up there? Yet another fashion to play with death, eh? Nom d'un chien! You have a star of good luck—you are saved for something great, it must be."

"M'sieur the Marshal," he flung at Francois. "Come and see me in the chateau."

There was a clatter of galloping hoofs; the bay mare and her rider were far down the street.

"Who is it, my mother—the fierce gentleman?" Francois asked.

"You are fortunate today, Francois," Claire answered him. "The good God has saved your life from a very great foolishness, and also I think you have made a friend. It is the new seigneur."

CHAPTER IV.

Coming to His Own.

Six years ago, before Waterloo, Napoleon had given the new chateau of Vicques and its lands to general the Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, whom he had before then fashioned into a very good pattern of a soldier out of material left over from the old aristocracy. Vicques lay in the Valley Delesmontes —"of the mountains"—a league from the little city Delesmontes, whose six thousand inhabitants constituted it the chief city of this valley of the Jura. Over Vicques hung the mountain called Le Rose, behind Le Rose loomed that greater mountain called Le Raimeu; back of Le Raimeu rolled the Jura range.

The Baron-General Gourgaud, taking possession of the chateau in this month of July, thought it lucky he had not seen this domain of his before, else the vision would have turned his heart from his duty. After a full career almost in boyhood—for the Cross of the Legion of Honor had come to him at twenty-four—after service in the Spanish and Austrian campaigns and diplomatic missions; after saving the emperor's life at Moscow; after Waterloo, Napoleon had chosen him as one of three officers to go with him to St. Helena. The chateau and estate of Vicques had been given to him by the emperor after that brave and lucky moment at Moscow when, the first man to enter the Kremlin, he had snatched the match from a mass of gunpowder which would a moment later have blown up both officers and emperor.

Ten years before he had married; four years after that his wife had died, and the daughter she left was now a girl of seven, a fairy type of girl.

"You are perfect in every way but one, Alixe," he said, as he swung her high to kiss her. "You are—"

"I know," the little girl interrupted, comrade-like. "I know the fault I have. I am not a boy. But I do not wish to be a boy, father. I would then grow to be a great fierce person with a mustache—like you. Imagine me, father, with a mustache," and the two laughed together.

* * * * * * * * *

"Father, father!" Alixe dashed into the library.

"There is a queer, little, village boy —but a good boy, father. He has brought you a bunch of lettuce—such white fat lettuce! Will you see him? He is a very good boy."

"Alixe, you are impayable," the general groaned. "I am your plaything! Yes, send for all the village—that will help me with my writing."

Alixe, ignoring sarcasm, had flown. In a minute she was back and led by the hand Francois.

"Ah!" the general greeted him sternly. "My friend, the marshal! You have already begun the attack on my chauteau, it seems?"

"No, my seigneur," the boy answered gravely. "Not yet. I bring you some salade as a present. It is from my mother's garden. I chose the best."

"I thank you," said the general with seriousness. "I am not sure if your mother will thank you equally. It is a good present."

Francois was gratified. Le Claire had this morning sent him to the gardens with a wide margin of time, and the inspiration had come as he looked down the gleaming row of white lettuce that he would take a tribute and make the visit which the seigneur had asked him to make.

General Gourgaud brought down his fist on a table so that it rattled and Francois started—but not Alixe.

"Sabre de bois!" he threw at the two children. "You have ruined my morning between you. I meant to finish those cursed chapters this morning. But let them wait. Having the honor to receive a visit from an officer of high rank, the least I can do is to entertain him. What amusement do you prefer, M'sieur the Marshal? I am at your service."

It was natural to Francois to believe every one kindly; he accepted with simplicity, if with slight surprise, the general's speech.

"The seigneur has fought battles under the great emperor himself?" the boy asked in an awed tone.

"Yes," came the abrupt answer.

"Think!" whispered the French boy. "To have fought under the emperor!" And the old soldier's heart thrilled suddenly. The child went on. "If the seigneur would tell me a story of one fight—of just one!"

"Ratisbon, Ratisbon!" clamored Alixe, and she scrambled over the arm of his chair to her father's knee and her hand went around his neck. "Tell about Ratisbon and the ditch and the ladders, father."

"Halt!" ordered the general. "I have not a week to talk. But I will tell about Ratisbon if you wish."

The deep voice stopped, then went on again. "The Austrians held Ratisbon and the bridge across the Danube river. The emperor wished to take the town and that bridge. Marshal Lannes was ordered to do it. You see, my children, the walls were very old but filled with Austrian artillery, and there was infantry on the parapets. An old ditch lay under the walls, a large ditch, dry, but twenty feet high and fifty feet wide. All the bottom of it was a vegetable garden. To take that town it was necessary to go down into that ditch and climb up again to the walls, and all the time one would be under fire from the Austrians on the walls—do you understand that, children? Very well. Twice the marshal asked for fifty volunteers to take the ladders and place them in the ditch. Twice one hundred men sprang forward, and it was necessary to choose the fifty. Twice they dashed out, carrying the ladders, from behind the great stone barn which had covered them, and each time the detail was wiped out—fifty men wiped out. It was like that, my children, the fight at Ratisbon."

"The emperor!" Francois breathed —"the emperor was there!"

Probably nothing, which had not to do with his daughter, could have touched General Gourgaud as did that tribute.

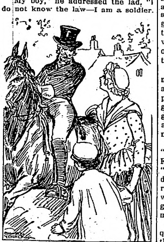
"Sapristi!" he growled. "The arm of the little corporal reaches a long way. The child has not even seen him, and voila, he loves him."

The child's face flushed. "But yes, my seigneur," Francois spoke quickly. "But yes. I have seen the emperor."

"You have seen Napoleon?" The general was surprised. "How is that?"

In a boyish fashion, in homely language of his class, yet with that dramatic instinct which is characteristically French, Francois told his tale as his grandmother had told it to him and to his brothers and sisters—the tale which the children called "Napoleon Comes." The general listened with a sincere interest.

"My boy," he addressed the lad, "I do not know the law—I am a soldier. Yet by my idea you are chevalier, created so by the act of the most powerful monarch who ever ruled France—by our Emperor Napoleon. The time may come when, as the emperor said, you may be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. But that is a small thing if the time comes when you may help another Bonaparte to come to his right, to rule over France It is that of which you must think till the hour strikes, and then it is that which you must give your life for."



"Come and See Me in the Chateau."

Little Francois, the visionary, the hero worshiper, trembled. "I will do it, my seigneur," he said, frightened yet inspired, lifted into a tremendous dizzying atmosphere. And with that a secret which he had told no one, not even his mother, broke forth. "My seigneur, a strange thing happens sometimes—I have dreams—yet they are not dreams—in broad daylight. I see things—I hear voices—which are not of our village. Three times I saw a long road up a mountain, and over the mountain was a large star. I saw it three times, and once a voice said 'It is the star of the Bonapartes, but also your star, Francois. Follow it.' "

The general was a hard-headed person for all his cult of Napoleon, and vision-seeing appeared to him nonsense. He pooh-poohed at once the idea of a star divided between the house of Bonaparte and a small peasant. "Your mother had better put a wet cloth in your cap," he advised. "Parbleu—seeing stars in midday! Some one-legged old fighter has been gabbling before you about the star of the Bonapartes, and that and a touch of sunstroke in this heat, it may be, have turned you silly. Let me hear no more of stars, but keep at your lesson and learn to be—"

With that he was aware that the boy did not hear him. The light figure was on tiptoes—the large eyes stared at the wall, and the child spoke in an uninflected voice as if something muffled spoke through him.

"I see the star," he said. "I see it through a window where there are iron bars. . . . Ah!" The interjection was in the boy's natural accent, and he shivered violently. "Ugh!" His teeth chattered and he looked about vaguely. "It is like an icehouse. I do not like those dreams; they make me so cold. Seigneur, it is late; my mother will not be pleased. And I must stop at the garden and pick the vegetables for supper—carrots and peas. I must hurry to get the peas and carrots."

Little Alixe, clutching her father's thumb, watched as the boy disappeared. Then, to the general's astonishment, she began to sob. "I—I don't know," she answered his quick question. "But I—I think it is because I am sorry the little boy was so cold."

CHAPTER V.

A Game of Cards.

Francois Beaupre—Le Francois of Vicques—sober, laborious, had in him a certain pig-headedness, and also a vein of the gambler which had swollen with use; yet because it had so far brought him only good luck the neighbors called this good judgment. He was a dealer in working oxen; he bought and raised and sold them, and only his wife knew what chances he often took in buying young beeves. It was a simple solid form of speculation, yet it was that.

On a day in September he left Vicques early in the morning to drive to the market in Delesmontes, a league distant, two pairs of oxen which he had bought as calves for almost nothing from poor stock out of a farm leagues away. He had fed and trained and cared for them till now they were all well set-up and powerful and smooth-working—ready to sell for a good price. At the market he found that there were few oxen to be disposed of, none which compared to his, and his ideas of value went up—he would get nine hundred francs for them, which delayed the sale.

So it came to be, by the time his bargain was closed, three o'clock in the afternoon, and he had had no dinner. With the cattle off his hands and the money in his pocket he felt a sense of leisure and of wealth. Hungry as a wolf he felt also, and he turned into the inn of Delesmontes, where the sign of a huge bear, cut out of tin and painted black, swung before the door.

A waitress approached him—a sommelliere—trim in her short calico skirt and white apron, her hair done in the picturesque fashion of the place. The girl took his order; as she turned to go a man just coming in knocked against her, and apologizing with many words, caught sight of Francois.

"Good day!" he saluted him heartily. "Good day, Monsieur Beaupre," and Francois, friendly always, answered "Good day," but with a reserve, for he did not recall the man. "You don't remember me? That is natural, for we met but once. Yet I have not forgotten you. It was at the house of my cousin, Paul Noirjean of Devillier."

Now Paul Noirjean was an old acquaintance and a solid man, and though Beaupre did not see him often, living six leagues away, he respected him highly. A cousin of his was to be considered, and Francois was embarrassed that his memory could not focus on the meeting. He tried to cover this with cordiality, and invited the stranger to share his meal.

"Not at all, not at all," the other answered. "Yet we must have a bottle of wine together, but it shall be my bottle."

Francois objected; the man insisted. At length: "See, we will play cards for that bottle," the unknown man suggested, and the cards were brought, and a game of La rams—euchre—was in progress in two minutes.

Meanwhile the wine had come, and Francois, a touch more generous and more cordial for it, was genially sorry when he won and the stranger must pay.

MORE INDIAN CASES ARE WON BY U. S.

LAST OF CRIMINAL ACTIONS SETTLED BY RESTITUTION AT FERGUS FALLS.

CONSPIRACY WAS THE CHARGE

Nolo-contendere Under Which Waller Neither Affirms Nor Denies Charge—Clears Up All Government Cases.

Fergus Falls.—The cases against L. S. Waller, Andrew Venoss and Louis D. Davis, who were indicted with several other persons in the United States court here last spring, were settled at a special term here.

The Charge in Case.

It was charged the men had conspired to induce government officials to issue patents to Indian lands which should not have been issued, their purpose being to purchase the lands from the Indians at low prices.

After the convictions at the recent term of court here, negotiations were entered into for the settlement of the cases, and the result of these negotiations was that Mr. Waller appeared in court and entered a plea of noncontendere, under which he neither admitted nor denied his guilt. This plea was accepted by the government attorneys and the court, and the small fine of $100 was imposed. The cases against Venoss and Davis were dismissed.

The Settlement Reached.

In connection with the acceptance of this plea and the imposition of a nominal fine, it is announced that Mr. Waller turns back to the government 1,160 acres of land which he had purchased, worth $10 or more an acre, and that he pays in $3,000 in cash for the land that he had sold to other parties. Suits for the cancellation of the title to this land are still pending, and in case the government wins, he and those associated with him will be liable to the purchasers on their warranties.

This clears up all of the criminal cases connected with the Indian land deals. The government is well satisfied with the outcome, as it has secured restitution as far as possible, and Mr. Waller and his associates avoid the civil disability that would attach in case they had stood trial and been convicted or had entered pleas of guilty. There are still about 1,100 civil cases pending to set aside deeds to lands.

MILDER WINTER RECALLED

Crookston Man Tells of Plowing Contest in Manitoba Christmas Day in '77.

Crookston.—Judge G. C. Wilde of this city recalls a year in which present weather was equalled if not surpassed. On Christmas day in 1877 he was in a farmers' plowing contest at St. John Batiste, seven miles from Morris, Man. There was no frost in the ground. On New Year's Day there was a great tree planting rally, and thousands of trees were planted. On the prairie there was no frost in the ground at all, but in the timber, where the ground was protected, the soil was frozen and the trees were chopped out and a bunch of the frozen earth transplanted with the trees. The trees took root next spring and never stopped growing. Seeding was well along by March 17 the following spring. After that the first snow of the season fell. A storm raged for several days, snow piling high over the seeded fields. The crop that fall was one of the most bountiful ever raised in Manitoba.

Chew Tobacco; Lad Dies.

Fergus Falls.—A report has been received from Parkers Prairie of the death of the 6-year-old son of William Schramm, a farmer. Neighbors were visiting at the Schramm home and the little boy, with two boys of the visiting party, obtained some chewing tobacco, and, boy-like, began chewing it, as they had seen the men do. The Schramm boy swallowed some of it and died in convulsions from nicotine poisoning.

$218,570 Unlisted in Otter Tail.

Fergus Falls.—When the tax lists for Otter Tail county were turned in, the state tax commission suspected that all of the wealth in several townships had not been listed for taxation and appointed F. J. Pfefferle of this city to visit the villages of Battle Lake, Parkers Prairie and Deer Creek and the townships of Sverdrup, Deer Creek and Effington as a special assessor, his mission being to discover any credits that had been overlooked. He has just handed in a report, adding $218,570 to the tax rolls of the county.

U. S. GAINS MORE CONFIDENCE

Government Presses Its Suits in Federal Court at Fergus Falls Since Winning Case.

Fergus Falls.—Since the conviction of M. J. Kolb and J. E. Perrault on conspiracy charges and the recovery of $25,000 worth of property which they had purchased from the Indians, the government seems to be more confident in pressing the hundreds of civil cases which are pending here to set aside deeds given by Indians to white men. It secured default judgments in thirty-seven of these cases the past week, the defendants failing to appear and the deeds being set aside without contests, and has filed amended complaints in some of the others.

One complaint that has just been amended is in the case of the United States vs. Harry Manes and the Farmers' and Merchants' State bank of Sheboygan, Wis., and sets forth some allegations of a sensational nature in unusually picturesque language. It is alleged that the father of Isabelle Warren, a 13-year-old Indian girl, was induced to have her estate probated as though she was dead, although in reality she was living, and that it was decreed to her father and mother, who thereupon executed a deed of it to Achsah Mooers.

The complaint goes on to relate that "in the meantime, like beasts of prey, bent upon devouring their helpless victims either dead or alive," certain white men induced the girl herself to sign a deed transferring her property to one Frank S. Graham,—the child being still in her thirteenth year, "and a child of the 'children of the forest,' and totally unequipped to defend herself and her property against the wiles and avariciousness of her more civilized but less humane white neighbors."

It is related further that she was to receive $800 for the land, but only received $100, that Graham immediately transferred his interest to Achsah Mooers, to whom the parents had assigned their interest after the probating of the estate, and that it was later sold to Harry Manes and mortgaged to the Sheboygan bank for $1,600.

The complaint closes by asking that all of these transactions be set aside It alleges that the Indian girl is a ward of the government, and that it is the duty of the government to protect her, as such ward, from "the greed, rapacity, cunning and perfidy of members of the white race."

CHARGE MURDEROUS ASSAULT

Emil Brooth Will Be Prosecuted on Charge of Man Pounded With Iron Bar.

Balaton.—Emil Brooth, otherwise known as Emil Baack, of Cameron township, Murray county, has been lodged in the county jail at Slayton on a charge of making a murderous assault on Guy Terry, a liveryman of this place. Brooth refuses to make a statement and the motive for the alleged crime is not known.

The condition of Terry, who was pounded with an iron bar weighing about four pounds, shows improvement, and it is expected he will recover. Brooth, who was held under the auto the two were riding, has a broken rib and his feet were frozen.

Brooth was bound over last fall on a grand larceny charge. While out on bail he disappeared, and his bond was declared forfeited after he had been indicted by the grand jury. Officials believe he was trying to make his way out of the country when he attacked Terry and started to drive the machine. The accident which followed spoiled his plans.

Rumors of Poisoning Put to Flight.

Fergus Falls.—Charles J. Rickert, a young man of the town of Oak Valley, died suddenly Saturday night after attending a Christmas entertainment at a district school house and partaking of candy and peanuts. He was seized with convulsions in the night and died in a few hours. The physician who was summoned was of the opinion death was due to strychnine poisoning, and Coroner J. G. Vigen, of this city, went down to investigate. The coroner was unable to find any evidence of the candy being poisoned, and concluded that death was due to acute kidney trouble probably brought on by the chilly drive after eating the sweets in the warm schoolhouse.

Drew Revolver; Is Fined.

Sleepy Eye.—Albert Gieske of Stark township was fined $25 by Judge I. M. Olsen for pointing a revolver at Nic Beckius at an auction last October. Gieske was saved from a heavier sentence by the fact that the state was unable to prove that the gun was loaded.

Goodly Sum for Tuberculosis.

Rochester.—Through the enterprise of Rochester women the sale of Red Cross seal stamps this year in Rochester far exceeded any past attempts and a good sum was realized for the fight on tuberculosis. The manager of a theatre was induced to secure a large number of the seals, which were pasted upon his advertising matter sent about the city, while a local church took up a collection for the purpose, buying the seals and placing them on the candy bags that were given to the children Christmas.

MYSTERY IN GIRL'S DEATH

Definitely Established Miss Cameron Was Seen Two Hours Before Body Was Found.

Minneapolis.—It is definitely established that at 6 a. m. last Tuesday Miss Rachel Cameron was in the Union station, bidding farewell to Miss Minnie Fjerestad, who was going to her parent's home at Kasson, Minn., for Christmas.

Less than two hours later Miss Cameron's body was taken from the river. It was so firmly frozen in the ice that it was necessary to call firemen to chop it out.

The police when they first were informed of these facts this morning refused absolutely to believe that Miss Cameron was alive at so late an hour. Later they were forced to accept the story as facts, for they are indisputable.

The new discovery does not solve the mystery of the woman's death. It deepens it. Every detail of the story which Miss Fjerestad told makes it more impossible to accept the theory that Miss Cameron ended her own life.

Miss Fjerestad, at Kasson accepts only the theory of murder.

WIDOW OF GOVERNOR WEDS

Mrs. John A. Johnson Becomes the Bride of William Alley Smith of Pittsburgh.

St. Paul.—A wedding beautiful in its appointments and details and marked with graceful simplicity was that of Mrs. John A. Johnson, widow of Governor Johnson, and William Alley Smith of Pittsburgh, Pa., which took place at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. George F. Van Slyck, 1180 Summit avenue.

The vows were spoken before an improvised alter of Easter lilies and palms and tall cathedral candles in candelabra, placed at either side of the altar. Dr. Maurice D. Edwards, pastor of the Dayton Avenue Presbyterian church, officiated in the presence of a small company of relatives and friends of the bride and groom.

Mr. Smith and his bride did not return at once to their future home in Pittsburgh, but will remain here some days, as a number of post-nuptial affairs are to be given in their honor.

LARGEST LAND OWNER DIES

C. J. Wright Stricken in Michigan—Was Ottertail County's Richest Real Estate Holder.

Fergus Falls.—A telegram from Battle Creek, Mich., announced the death of Charles J. Wright, who went there a month ago for treatment. He was Ottertail county's largest land owner and wealthiest citizen. He came to this city in the early 70s, his uncle, the late George B. Wright, having just laid out the townsite. He first engaged in surveying, and later became land agent for the Northern Pacific and Great Northern Railway companies.

Mr. Wright invested every dollar he could secure in land when it could be had for almost nothing. He served as clerk of court here for eight years, was a member of the city council and was elected to the state legislature in the autumn of 1908, serving one term and donating his salary to various school libraries in the county. His wife and three children survive him.

$30,000 Subscribed at Rochester.

Rochester.—Thirty thousand dollars toward a new edifice was raised at the First Methodist church by Bishop William A. Quayle presiding. After preaching a Christmas sermon the bishop asked for $25,000 in twenty-five minutes and at the close of the period it was announced that $30,000 had been subscribed. It is planned by Rochester Methodists to build an edifice costing $40,000. Bishop Quayle preached at Byron in the evening.

Farmers Organize Phone Company.

Fergus Falls.—Articles of incorporation of the Austad & Buse Telephone company, a farmers' organization that is to run lines south of this city, were filed here. The company incorporates with a capitalization of $10,000, and the officers are J. C. Easterday, president; John Thorson, vice president, and M. E. Borgerud, secretary and treasurer.

Winona.—The report of the government fish station at Homer shows that in the past season a total of 765,000 young fish were placed in rivers by the United States bureau of fisheries after being hatched at the station. The season was a very successful one, says Superintendent W. S. Smith. An effort will be made next year to increase the output of black bass.

Public Christmas Tree Success.

Albert Lea, Minn. — Thousands of children of all ages danced, clapped their hands, and shouted with joy around the big public Christmas tree during the celebration. The white spruce, which was planted 20 years ago by Joel G. Winkjer, now state dairy and food commissioner, on the Henderson farm, stood on Broadway. It was elaborately trimmed with gold and silver tinsel ornaments and electric lights in many colors. On the topmost branch a brilliant star waved to and fro.

Housework is a Burden

The daily cares of keeping house and bringing up a family are hard enough for a healthy woman. The tired, weak mother who struggles from morn to night with a lame, aching back is carrying a heavy burden.

Many women believe that urinary disorders and backache are "female troubles" and must be endured. But men suffer the same aches and troubles when the kidneys are sick.

Women are especially subject to kidney disease. Tight clothing, indoor work, the ordeals of childbirth, the worry, and the stooping, straining and striving of housework all help to bring it on. At first the trouble may be only backache, sick headache, dizziness and a drowsy, dull languid feeling, but this condition is dangerous to neglect, for dropsy, gravel and deadly Bright's disease start in some such small way.

Don't be discouraged. When backache, nervousness and irregular or painful passages of the kidney secretions begin to bother you, use Doan's Kidney Pills, the remedy that has brought new life and strength to thousands of suffering women. There are no poisonous nor narcotic drugs in Doan's Kidney Pills—nothing to injure nor cause a habit. Delicate women can use them with perfect safety.

"Every Picture Tells A Story"

"Oh! What a pain."

The following case is typical of the cures effected by Doan's Kidney Pills. Grateful testimony is the best evidence.

SAVED HER LIFE

Made Well After Doctors Failed

Mrs. John Brumley, 114 12th St., Greeley, Colo., says: "I believe I would be in my grave if I hadn't used Doan's Kidney Pills. The first sign of kidney trouble was a constant ache in my back. I dragged along, day after day, feeling too tired to attempt my housework. Then came frequent dizzy spells that made me weak for hours. The kidney secretions were irregular in passage and very distressing. My feet ached and swelled until I could hardly stand. The swelling extended upwards to my limbs and hips. For three months I hardly slept enough to keep me alive. I was awfully nervous and irritable. My case puzzled the doctors and their medicine didn't help me. A relative had been cured of kidney trouble by Doan's Kidney Pills and advised me to try them. I did and the results were wonderful. The backache stopped, the swelling went away and I rested better. The kidney secretions got all right and once more I enjoyed good health. Recently the kidney secretions were analyzed by the doctor and he found no signs of kidney complaint. Doan's Kidney Pills alone cured me."

ADMONITION HAD NOT SUNK

Small Girl Calmly Put Aside the Chiding Administered by Her Paternal Relative.

Here is a "kid" story which Dr. Oakley Smith, president of the Chicago College of Naprodathy, enjoys telling his friends:

"An eastern intimate of mine," said Doctor Smith, "has a child of extraordinary precocity. She is only three, but has a mind of her own which she sometimes aserts to the consternation of her father and mother.

"It became necessary one day for the child's father to reprimand her gently, but firmly, when she misconducted herself at the table. The child's face bore a pained expression. The mother was silent. A guest at the table wore the resigned air that guests always do on such occasions. As the father finished his admonition the silence was electric—burdened with foreboding. And the strand was broken only when the baby looked up at her mother and asked:

"'Mamma, did somebody say something?'"

Pessimistic Deacon Philander.

Deacon Philander of our church is so practical that at times he appears to be profane, says the Kansas City Star. Our minister, a very modest and well meaning man, approached Philander the other day and said: "Brother Philander, we are to be congratulated. Of course you noticed what an immense congregation we had at our special services the other evening. I am told that at the opera house there was a very small crowd out to see the show. The interest in our work is certainly increasing wonderfully." "Yes," replied old Philander, very solemnly, "I noticed the things of which you speak, but I much fear that things would be different if we charged a dollar admission and the show at the opera house was free." As church treasurer Philander gets into a lot of things.

ECZEMA ITCHED AND BURNED

R. F. D. No. 2, Seymour, Mo.—"My scalp broke out with fine pimples at the start. They itched and burned so much that I was compelled to scratch them and they would fester and come to a head and break out again. The trouble was attended by such burning and itching I could not sleep, also when I sweat it burned the same. My hair fell out gradually and the scalp kept rough and dry with itching and burning. After about two years the pimples broke out between my shoulders. My clothing irritated them. I was troubled with that eczema five or six years.

Wise Johnnie.

Little Johnnie had been naughty all day. At last, to cap the climax, he slapped his small sister.

When father came home from the office the mother told him of his son's misdeeds.

"The next time you tease your sister you go to bed without dinner," the father said sternly.

The kiddie sat in silence for a few moments. Then all of a sudden he turned to his father.

"The next time I want to hit sister I'll wait till after dinner," he remarked.

REFUSED TO GET EXCITED

Old Man Jones Philosophically Reasoned That Norah Had Right to Go Out as She Chose.

The topic switched to taking a philosophic view of things, and Congressman Patrick D. Norton of North Dakota told of the beautiful composure with which one Jones met a rather trying situation.

One day Mrs. Jones rushed into the old man's presence with hasty steps and a wild look of excitement.

"Oh, John! Oh, John!" she exclaimed with a lot of emotional thrills. "Norah made a mistake and tried to light the kitchen fire with gasoline!"

"Gasoline, eh?" calmly responded John. "Did she get it started?"

"Did she get it started?" cried the amazed Mrs. Jones. "It blew her out the kitchen window!"

"That's all right, my dear," returned the philosophic Jones. "It was her afternoon out, anyway."

What He Wanted It For.

Little Caillou, a French boy, was allowed to take luncheon with his mother and her guests on condition that he ate only that which was offered him, making no comment. By and by, however, when dessert was on the table, Caillou could not resist a certain temptation.

"Please, mamma, may I have a sardine?"

"No, my son, you know very well that you may not have a sardine, that such things are not allowed you. And I thought you promised me not to ask for anything special to eat."

"Oh, I don't want to eat it," was the little boy's ingenious and astonishing answer, "I just want to put it in my glass of water and see it float."

Poor Woman's Gift.

A poor blind woman in Paris, we are told, put 27 francs into a plate at a missionary meeting.

"You cannot afford so much," said one.

"Yes, sir, I can," she answered.

On being pressed to explain, she said: "I am blind, and I said to my fellow straw-workers, 'How much money do you spend in a year for oil in your lamps when it is too dark to work nights?' They replied, 'About twenty-seven francs.'

"So," said the poor woman, "I found that I could save so much in the year because I am blind and do not need a lamp, and I give it to shed light to the dark heathen lands."

400,000 Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position.

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessable a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

The Robinson Diamonds

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

This is the first of a series of stories, each complete in itself, which narrate the tremendously exciting adventures of Nikolai—a sort of modern Robin Hood who calls himself a "leveler of fortunes." The clever device by which he restored the Robinson Diamonds to their rightful owner is the subject of the present tale.

I think there must be some malign Providence that sends our enemies across our paths just when we think that we have put them out of our lives forever. How else can one account for the meeting between Sir Julius Robinson and Mary Boyd?

It happened aboard the Linlithgow, one of the older vessels of the Atlantic passenger fleet. There were not many of us, and we soon became intimate. The man in my cabin was, I fancied, a Russian or Austrian by birth; he called himself Baron Nikolai and seemed possessed of unlimited wealth. Sir Julius Robinson and Van Aam were South African diamond magnates about to pay a visit to America in order to float some company, and after the lights were turned out in the smoking room the four of us played poker into the small hours of the morning in Sir Julius' cabin. Nikolai always won; afterward, when our association had become close, I learned that cards were one means whereby he made his living. But that is neither here nor there; if he took from the rich, he had supreme compassion for the poor. Indeed, he posed as a sort of Robin Hood, called himself, whimsically, a leveler of fortunes, and claimed his own share as middleman in these transactions.

Sir Julius and Mary Boyd met on the deck the second morning. I saw the fat man grow pale; he put one hand out to steady himself against the rail of the ship, and as the girl swept by, not deigning to notice him, he looked after her with a scowl. It was Mary herself who told me of the circumstances later.

It was a very simple story. Her father had been one of the first discoverers of diamonds in the river Vaal. Robinson and he had been partners; when Boyd fell sick of typhoid fever Robinson possessed himself of his claim through some legal chicanery. Boyd emerged from the hospital to find himself penniless. His wife died in privation not long afterward, and Mary was adopted by a poor family of the district. She educated herself, became a school teacher, fell in love with a visiting American, and was now on her way to Savannah, the terminal port of call, to marry him.

Meanwhile Robinson, grasping his stolen prize, had flourished. He became a millionaire, was knighted, and had put Mary Boyd out of his recollections.

When Nikolai heard the story his eyes blazed.

"I have learned one thing in the course of my experience, Summers," he said to me. "No man can sin and get away with it. Somehow, somewhere, Robinson will make restitution."

"Who will compel him if the courts can't?" I asked.

"I will!" he cried.

It was on that same evening that Robinson, insolent and flushed with wine, pulled from the inside of his shirt a silken cord at the end of which was hung a chamois leather bag. He tossed it on the table and opened it. A handful of brilliant pebbles tumbled out.

"Do you fellows know what these are?" he hiccoughed.

"Uncut diamonds," replied Van Aam sharply. "Put them away and don't be a fool, Robinson."

"Why shouldn't I be a fool if I want to?" demanded the millionaire. "I got the coin, ain't I? Can't I be a fool if it amuses me? Yes, diamonds, gentlemen; uncut, but worth a cool half million. These are my samples, and if I can't float the biggest capitalized company in the trade on the strength of them, why I'll pitch them into the sea. No, I won't either—I'll hang them around pretty Mary Boyd's neck for a love gift."

I longed to break his own neck. Nikolai nudged me under the table and, looking up, I saw him frown slightly. I understood the warning; I knew that he had conceived some scheme which I must not spoil by precipitate action.

"Worth a cool half million, gentlemen," went on the millionaire, gathering up his samples. "Pounds—not dollars. Sometime I'll tell you how I jumped old man Boyd's claim when he was sick. I s'pose Mary's painted me as black as Satan to you; what? Well, if I hadn't jumped his claim he'd have jumped mine. Ain't all fair in business?" He took the last stone in his hand and toyed with it thoughtfully. "I'd give this to Mary for one kiss," he mumbled, "but I know she wouldn't do it. She's hounded me for years and hates me like poison because I won't be blackmailed. She'd want more than one—two, I reckon."

"Shut up, Jule," said Van Aam, kicking him. "You've had too much champagne."

The ship was rolling heavily in the trough of the seas. It was the end of the tenth day; on the next we might look for land. As I turned into my cabin I fancied that I smelled smoke, but I was dog tired from the long play, and must have undressed and tumbled into bed without knowing what I was doing, for the next thing that I remembered, after turning the handle of our door, was hearing the sound of hurrying feet above us. The next minute Nikolai was shaking me by the shoulder.

"Wake up," he cried. "The ship's afire."

I sprang to my feet in panic, and as I did so I heard confused cries and shouting outside; then screams of women wakened from sleep by that most dreadful of sea tragedies. As I opened the door a cloud of acrid smoke rushed in. Nikolai closed the door and restrained me with one hand.

"Take your time, Summers," he said. "It's still below decks; there's plenty of time. They aren't even getting out the lifeboats yet."

I dressed in a hurry, threw my overcoat over me and hastened out with my companion. We had to fight our way through the smoke, and the floors were noticeably warm beneath our feet. On the deck I cannoned into Sir Julius.

"What shall I do?" he whimpered, clutching at my arm, and I saw that his face was gray with fear. "The ship's afire. We shall all be drowned."

"There's plenty of water to put it out," said Nikolai sardonically, looking down at the heaving sea. "By the way, where are those diamonds, Robinson?"

"They're here," gasped the millionaire, placing one pudgy hand upon his breast. "I'll give you all if you will save my life." He had nothing over his pajamas but a long mackintosh, covering him from throat to knees, and carpet slippers. At his side stood Van Aam, perfectly cool and collected, smoking a cigar. He was as spruce as though he had just dressed for dinner. All around us women were huddled upon the deck; beneath us the steerage passengers kept up a constant outcry. The officers were guarding the lifeboats—which were being provisioned. From the afterhatch a dense black cloud rolled up.

"Your first visit to the States?" said Van Aam to me, coolly. "Yes? You'll enjoy these parts. I own an interest in a summer hotel on one of the Georgian islands. We can't be far from shore. Look at Sir Julius!"

"I thought you were a South African," I said.

"I am," he answered. "But I've spent several summers in America of late, and Sir Julius is coming for the first time under my escort. By Jove, look at Miss Boyd!"

I saw Mary Boyd descending the gangway. She was completely dressed, and, save that her hair was unfastened, she might have been preparing to go ashore at port. As she passed us, calm enough in the face of the ever increasing danger, I heard Nikolai say to the millionaire:

"You will give all your diamonds if I save your life?"

"Yes, yes," cried the millionaire, who was leaning, with a sea-sick expression, against the rail, enviously watching the nearest lifeboat. "How can you do it? Can't you get me a special lifeboat, with a crew, and come with me? We four—and my man. Surely the captain will do that for me."

Nikolai took him by the shoulder and shook him as a terrier shakes a rat.

"You hound!" he roared. "Do you want to leave the rest to perish? Do you think a man will enter the boats before the women are safe? Robinson," he continued, more kindly, "our chances are desperate ones. Do a just act before you die; restore those diamonds to Miss Boyd."

I looked round. Mary was standing quietly beside me.

"But how do you know we won't be saved after all?" asked Julius cunningly. "The law can't touch me."

"My poor fellow, there are other kinds of laws where you are going," Nikolai answered. And even as the words left his lips there came a roaring sound, a spurt of flame, and the afterhatch disappeared in a geyser of fire.

"All hands man the boats!" roared the captain; fifty sailors sprang forward and began to swing the boats free from their lashings. There was a universal cry; men started forward; the officers drew their revolvers and the cowards slunk back again.

"Let him keep his stones," said Mary with quiet contempt. "I have no need for that sort of restitution."

"But if he gives them freely—" began Nikolai.

"I will not take his gifts."

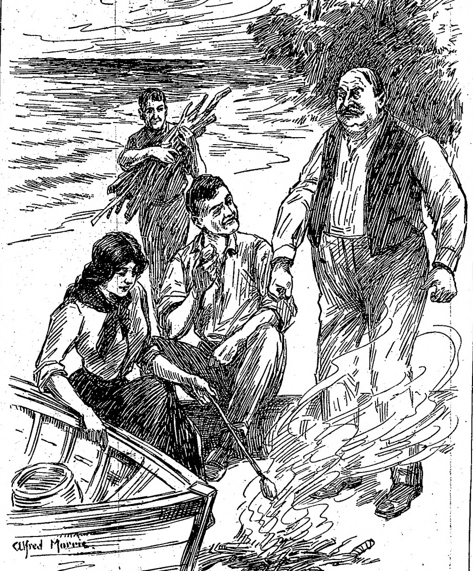
"But if he barters them or sells them to you—"

Mary looked at him doubtfully. A lane was formed in front of us and the women were passed into the boat. The men followed. The millionaire, Van Aam, Mary and I found ourselves together in the bow. It began to descend. Julius, reduced to a cowering heap of fear, crouched against the gunwale. I remember seeing the sea heave toward us—and then—

We were all in the water, and at the same instant every porthole became ablaze. The fire had reached the cargo, which consisted largely of sulphur and nitre. A violent explosion followed. Whether this or the fall stunned me I do not know, but I opened my eyes to see, high over my head, the lifeboat hanging by one rope from the side of the sinking ship, while close at my side swam Nikolai, supporting Mary. I understood what happened immediately. The ropes had refused to work; one had broken, and all had been flung into the water. I must have been swimming for some time before recovering consciousnes, for all this passed through my brain as some horrible moving picture play. When I regained full possession of my faculties I found myself clinging to a small water-cask that floated at my side, tossing like a cork upon the waves. The ship had disappeared and under the light of the stars the sea looked inky black and void of life. Had all except myself perished? As the thought flashed through my mind I heard myself hailed, and, looking round saw Nikolai, not twelve feet away, clinging to the side of an empty lifeboat, one arm supporting Mary.

"Swim to the other side and climb in while I steady her," he called.

I struck out with the cask, climbed in with difficulty and hauled in the cask after me. Then I helped Nikolai in with the half-conscious girl. The oars were still in the boat, but the provisions were gone; evidently this was the one that had broken loose from the vessel at the moment of the catastrophe. As we sank back exhausted upon the bottom a feeble voice cried to us from over the waters.



"Ain't I one of the party?"

We seized the oars and pulled with a will. In a few moments I made out a man clinging to a spar; it was Van Aam, and with one hand he supported the puffy face of Julius.

"I had to stun him to keep him from pulling me under," he whispered as we hoisted him in. "But he was too fat to sink. Now all together!"

We got the millionaire into the boat, but that was our last effort. We drifted to and fro upon the face of the sea until day broke, disclosing a long, flat coast-line not five miles away.

Sir Julius, who since recovering consciousness had been alternately praying and weeping, sat up and pointed.

"Thank God, we're saved; we're off Georgia," he cried.

Van Aam laughed sarcastically.

"I wish it were," he said. "That's one of the Caymans, an uninhabited cluster of coral isles covered with jungle. Our troubles are only commencing."

"But we've got food," said the millionaire. "We can signal to passing ships."

Then, looking round, his eye fell upon the water cask.

"Where's breakfast?" he demanded peevishly. "We ain't in such bad straits after all, but I'm devilish hungry. Got any eggs?"

"Sir Julius Robinson," said Nikolai, tapping the fat millionaire upon the shoulder, "all the eggs you are likely to get during the next few weeks are turtles' eggs—raw."

"Ain't you got any food?" asked Julius, bewildered.

"Take up that oar and pull, or we'll toss you overboard," shouted Nikolai savagely.

The millionaire attempted to obey. But his flabby hands could hardly hold the handle, and Van Aam snatched it from him impatiently and gave it to Miss Boyd. She pulled bravely, and soon we began to draw nearer to the shore. After several hours of work under a burning sun we beached the boat upon a shore of dense and impenetrable jungle.

"And now to make a camp," said Nikolai. He had taken command as if by right, and no one questioned him. He assaigned Van Aam to gather wood from the jungle—happily I had a silver box full of matches which had escaped wetting; to myself he gave the task of gathering turtles' eggs from the shore; he announced his intention of ascending a peak which was visible some miles away through the jungle in order to investigate our surroundings. It was generally agreed that we must have landed upon one of the uninhabited and inhospitable Caymans.

I was lucky in my search and came back with several turtles' eggs; I also discovered a pelican colony and located several nests of young. These would serve us at a pinch, though the flesh would be as unpleasant as that of most sea-birds.

When I returned I found the fire merrily blazing and Mary in charge of the camp. Sir Julius lay stretched out on his back groaning. Nikolai, who returned a few minutes after me, announced that we appeared to have landed upon a large island, and that he had found no trace of water. However, our cask contained enough to last us, with care, for several days. We broiled the turtles' eggs and sat down to our unappetizing meal. Then Sir Julius rose with alacrity and stretched out his hand toward the pot.

"Turtles' eggs, hey?" he said sniffing. "Well, they don't look so bad. I'll take that one."

"You'll get breakfast in the morning if you work for it," said Nikolai.

"What?" shrieked Sir Julius, "are you thieves going to leave me to starve? Ain't I one of the party?"

"Sir Julius," said Nikolai with a bow, "you can gather all the turtle's eggs you can find in the morning and have them for yourself—"

"Raw," I interrupted. "The matches belong to me."

"Damn you," snarled the millionaire. "I could buy fifty such puppies as you."

"You can buy your share of the meal," said Nikolai.

The millionaire's features relaxed into a sour smile. "Oh, trying to hold me up, hey?" he said. "Well, I haven't got my checkbook here, but you can charge it up against me. How much a day? Laundry included?"

"One diamond a meal," said Nikolai blandly.

Sir Julius turned livid; he clutched at his neck where hung the chamois bag suspended from the cord.

"You don't get anything," he shouted. "That's a nice trick to play on a man. Because I've got a few precious stones—"

"I want nothing," said Nikolai. "Miss Boyd is the hostess here. Diamonds are nothing but crystallized carbon. As you are aware, Sir Julius, they have no intrinsic value apart from their relation to other commodities. In Maiden Lane or Kimberly they bring good prices; here they are worth exactly one turtle's egg for the smaller ones and one turtle's egg and a drink of water for the finer stones."

Sir Julius detached the bag and picked out a tiny stone.

"Here! Give me a turtle's egg," he snarled.

Nikolai picked out the smallest egg and handed it to the millionaire with a bow. While Sir Julius devoured it greedily, Nikolai turned the diamond over to Miss Boyd.

"We have a new boarder," he said. "Please accept his meal ticket in advance."

Mary took the diamond with a smile. When the millionaire had concluded his meal he bought a drink with another stone.

"How many more have you?" asked Van Aam, laughing.

"Twenty-four," answered Sir Julius with a snarl.

"Three a day," mused Van Aam, "and one for lodging—unless Sir Julius prefers to sleep outside the campfire among the raccoons. That will last six days. Perhaps by that time we shall find some manner of reaching a more hospitable shore."

"Nikolai," said Van Aam, when the millionaire had departed wrathfully to pace up and down the sandy beach and battle with his emotions, "where do you think we are? This is not one of the Caymans. There is no scrap of coral formation. We must be north of the coral limit—that would mean in the latitude of the Bahamas."

He ceased and sprang to his feet suddenly. "Come with me, Nikolai," he cried. "I want to speak to you. Quick, before it grows dark. We have some walking to do."

They did not return until after sunset. Then they were both chuckling.

"Miss Boyd and Mr. Summers," said Nikolai, "excuse this mirth in the presence of such danger. But really we have a joke too exquisite to be shared. How long will it take our stout friend to dispose of his diamonds?"

"Six days," said Mary, smiling.

"And you promise to keep them?"

"Yes," said Mary, her face suddenly becoming serious. "Yes, I will. Do you know he tried to push me out of the boat when they lowered it from the deck?"

Nikolai clenched his fists. "It's a pity we can't leave him here to rot," he muttered. "But after all we have some sort of human duty toward him."

"The worst of it is," said Van Aam, "that we shall have to stay in this confounded place until he has passed over his board."

"Have you seen a ship?" I cried.

Van Aam and Nikolai looked at one another and laughed.

"Well," said Van Aam, "the secret will keep six days, won't it?"

That night Sir Julius paid out another diamond for his lodging, and his raucous snores, interspersed with groans as he tossed from side to side upon the stony ground, kept most of us awake until the sun rose.

We exacted a tribute in advance that day, and when Sir Julius in a last attempt to save his gems offered to work for his living, we sent him off for turtles' eggs. We watched him wander off into the jungle and peer into the trees; that effort was too much for him, and thereafter he lay at home in sullen silence while we went off on our expeditions.

But not to gather turtles' eggs. At evening Van Aam and Nikolai disappeared, returning on the following morning when the sun was well up over the trees. They called to Mary and myself to follow them, and, leaving the millionaire sitting despairingly beneath the thorn shrubs, we hastened to a tiny glade beside a trickling rivulet, where we found spread out upon the grass a first-class banquet. There was a ham, two loaves of fresh bread, a pound of butter, clean napkins, and, to crown all, a bottle of champagne.

"Fall to, fall to," said Van Aam, inviting us to the feast. "When you are satisfied the mystery shall be entirely explained."

Even our curiosity could not overcome our hunger. Two days' diet of turtles' eggs had sickened us of that staple food for all time. When, at last, we laid our napkins aside we rose and followed our companions through a narrow path in the jungle. A mile ahead we emerged into a clearing! we heard the sound of the sea; and all at once, rounding a promontory, there appeared before our astonished gaze—

"My little hotel—my latest investment," said Van Aam proudly, pointing to an immense five-story erection, covering some half an acre, set in the middle of spacious grounds.

"Then we are—" I gasped.

"Shipwrecked off the Georgia coast, as I had suspected. And providentially upon the very island where I have laid out my latest summer resort. We open in a week; you gentlemen, and you, Miss Boyd, must be my guests throughout the season."

"Oh, I can't," said Mary, blushing. "I have—I've an engagement in Savannah."

"Young woman," said Van Aam sternly, "this is called Honeymoon House and is built specially with a view to the requirements of elopers."

"But I'm not going to elope," pleaded Mary.

"We'll take you all the same," said Van Aam magnanimously. "But say—do you think you could endure another four days in camp if I hide a pillow and some plankets for you and bring you out to lunch every day under the trees? It's worth it—for the diamond necklace."

LITTLE SENSE IN "HUSTLING"

Reckless Use of Energy Does Not Stamp Man as One Capable of the Biggest Tasks.

"When I travel," said a young millionaire in New York City, "I want to move. My time is worth money and I waste time on slow trains." He was explaining why he had hired a special train to carry him from Minneapolis to New York. It is almost needless to add that he did not make his millions, but inherited them. If he had hewn out his own fortune, it is altogether probable he would not be riding in special trains across the continent. The probability is that those from whom he inherited his fortune did not ride over the country in special trains.

It goes without saying that "time is money," and wise men are jealous rather than prodigal of their hours, says the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle. Those who perform big tasks how fatal is the habit of procrastination and how necessary it is to guard those moments which may be turned into times of fruitfult accomplishment or lost because of waste and deadening delay. But moderation and poise are essential elements of success. We get much of our health, happiness and character through restraint.

Men may hurry in their absorbing anxiety to be scholars and lose their health; they may devote themselves continuously to pleasure in a feverish anxiety to enjoy life and reap only the dregs of despair; they may rush headlong after wealth, only to find that there is no sweetness in treasure accumulated with a spirit which has denied to itself the influences of culture and refinement. Haste may lead to wasteful extravagance. There is a great difference between legitimate hustle and an extravagant dissipation of energy and time. We must remember that haste sometimes makes waste.

Bad Luck.

George Ade told at a picnic at Hazelbrook farm a story about Atlantic City.

"A young fellow," he said, "went to Atlantic City, had a gay time, and at the end of his vacation eloped with an Altoona girl.

"Several years later the Altoona girl, now his wife, said to him during a quarrel:

"'You were bright and sweet enough that summer at Atlantic City, you old bear! I'd just like to know how many girls you made love to at the hotel before you took to me!'

"'Twelve,' the man groaned; 'but I didn't thing to count 'em up till it was too late.'"

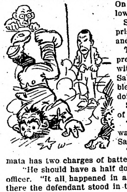
Tales of GOTHAM and other CITIES

Something Similar to an Explosion Happened

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Thomas Sakamata sat silently on the bench of the dock in Police Judge Shortall's courtroom. On his right sat a giant with a brutal face and watery and inflamed eyes, who was charged with vagrancy. On his left sat another giant whose skin was sallow and whose black eyes had an ugly leer.



Sakamata, wedged in between these monstrous prisoners, appeared very small, very miserable and very insignificant.

The giants seemed to be quite ignorant of the presence of the slender Sakamata. Once the giant with the watery eyes dug his elbow rudely into Sakamata's side, and, bending a foolishly fierce, bleary regard at the Oriental, asked: "Wot y' bin doin'? Snuffin' de coke?"

Sakamata glanced up coldly out of the corners of his slant eyes, but did not vouchsafe any reply.

"Say," began the giant, threateningly, but he was interrupted by the judge calling the name of Sakamata.

"What about this case?" asked the judge. "Sakamata has two charges of battery against him."

"He should have a half dozen more by good rights," replied the arresting officer. "It all happened in a chop suey place on Post street. When I got there the defendant stood in the middle of the floor with a Japanese in each hand. One was a waiter and the other was a cook. Sakamata used the two men like he was practicing with Indian clubs."

"Put the defendant back in the dock," ordered the judge. "I'll think over his case."

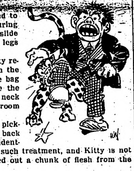
Sakamata was shoved into the dock again, and he went over to sit down in his old seat when suddenly the two giants, maliciously grinning, moved together, thus closing up the vacant space on the bench.

Then something like an explosion happened. One giant sailed through the air and landed in a heap in a corner of the dock. The other was sent sprawling on the floor near the dock gate. Sakamata was the exploding force.

"Bring that man out here!" cried Judge Shortall. "I happened to see that. From what I just now saw I am inclined to believe two things: First, that the policeman was not exaggerating as to the defendant's strength, and, second, that he used his strength in self-defense. Dismissed."

Leopard Bites Chunk From Leg of Manicure Man

NEW YORK.—Bill Snyder, head keeper of the Central park zoo, had a piece bitten out of his left leg by a leopardess the other day. Bill cauterized the wound with pure carbolic acid, bound it up, and proceeded to trim the leopard's claws. Flanked by two deputy keepers, Bill went to the leopard house with ropes, nippers, a file, soothing lotions, and a big bag fastened to the end of a pole. The procedure in manicuring the claws of a member of the cat tribe is to slide the bag over the animal's head and bind its legs with ropes.

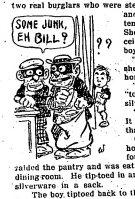


Bill entered Kitty's cage with the bag. Kitty retreated to a corner, and crouched so flatly on the bottom of the cage that Bill couldn't slip the bag over her nose. He walked up to Kitty with the intention of grabbing her by the back of the neck and yanking her up until there should be room for the bag to go under her chin.

There are few persons who would think of picking up a leopardess by the loose skin on the back of the neck—and Bill is one of the few. Incidentally there are few "cats" that will stand for such treatment, and Kitty is not one of these. So she reached out and nipped out a chunk of flesh from the calf of Bill's leg.

Chicago Boy Raids Pantry; Finds Two Burglars

CHICAGO.—While raiding his mother's pantry for bread and jam the other afternoon, Charles Claus, nine years old, 1730 Diversey parkway, surprised two real burglars who were stealing his mother's silverware, called the police and had them arrested. Just as Charles was attending to the booking of his prisoners at the Sheffield avenue station the desk sergeant received a telephone call from Mrs. Otto Claus, the boy's mother.



"I want you to watch out for my boy, Charles," she said. "He disappeared while I was away from home."

"He's right here, madam," replied the sergeant, "together with the two burglars who stole your silverware."

"What!" and the receiver banged on the hook. It was the first knowledge Mrs. Claus received that her home had been robbed.

Charles came home from school and finding the house locked up, went around to the kitchen. He found a window open and crawled through. He raided the pantry and was eating bread and jam when he heard a noise in the dining-room. He tip-toed in and saw two men with their backs to him stuffing silverware in a sack.

The boy tiptoed back to the kitchen, climbed out of the window and started for the police station.

Detectives Spend "Bad" Money; Have No Evidence

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—Bert Cowdrey, a Chicago detective, met Capt. Tom Halls of the secret service during the prison congress. They talked of mutual friends and Captain Halls reached into his wallet for a card. Cowdrey spied a counterfeit note Halls had captured.

"Raised, was it?" Cowdrey asked.

"Yes, from two to ten," Halls answered, meaning that the bill had been raised from a $2 bank note to $10.

I SPENT TH' TEN I FOUND IN YOUR—WHAT!

"That reminds me of a funny thing that happened to me not long ago," Cowdrey related. "I had pinched a bill raiser and had one of his bills in my pocket. My wife needed some money and went into my pockets the next morning. She got the bill, went down to a department store, spent it and then came home and told me about it. Well, just imagine how I felt. I chased down to the store, but the bad bill had been passed on to some one else and I never heard of it again."

"Something like a couple of officers from southern Indiana," Captain Halls broke in. "They had arrested a counterfeiter and when his case came up for trial they were summoned as witnesses. When the district attorney asked them to produce their evidence one of the officers fumbled in his pockets nervously, blushed and looked like a sad sheep.

"Didn't you bring the bad money with you?" the district attorney inquired.

"'Yes, sir,' the officer replied, 'but we missed connection at Terre Haute and I—I guess we spent it.'"

PROMINENT PEOPLE

CROY DUCHESS "NOT EQUAL OF HUSBAND"

The 1914 edition of the Almanach de Gotha, which has just appeared in Berlin, categorically announces that the marriage of Miss Nancy Leishman and the duke of Croy "is not a marriage of equal birth."

It is understood in royal circles that this phraseology, which is unusual in the Almanach, is printed at the instigation of the Prussian royal herald's office, and is intended as notice to the duke that his wife is not entitled to the privileges of the kaiser's court or the other royal courts of Germany.

When the duke of Croy and Miss Nancy Leishman were married at Geneva on October 28 there was a strong presumption that the bride would not be acknowledged as the duchess of Croy in Germany. The marriage took place without the consent of the kaiser and with the disapproval of the family of the duke.

Upon the announcement of the engagement last April the match was disapproved at a family council, called by the dowager duchess of Croy, the duke's mother, or members of all the branches of the Croys in Belgium, Prussia, France and Hungary. Later the Association of High German Nobility, at a meeting at Frankfort-on-Main, also opposed the marriage.

MR. BORLAND'S LATEST PET

Representative William P. Borland, who not long ago gained fame by bringing a baby home under each arm with which to surprise his wife and augment his household, was seized by another whim on his recent trip to Panama and brought home a monkey.

She was a beauty, as monkeys go, and while Mr. Borland does not know the technical name of the species, he affirms that she had a white face and was just about the cunningest and rarest thing in the monkey line he ever saw. In fact, she was more beautiful than good and seemed wholly lacking in appreciation.

Instead of grovelling at his feet in gratitude for being transported from the jungles of Panama right into the very arms of a member of congress, she grew morose over the matter, got to be a regular man hater, and found her only solace when bedded on the nice soft muff of Mrs. Borland. Mr. Borland tried to win her heart, but three bites now mar his beauty. The monkey? Well, she is out at the National zoo at Washington, where sport the wild animals corralled by Theodore Roosevelt in the wilds of Africa and Yellowstone park; the collection of possums sent to President Taft and President Wilson,

PANCHO VILLA, SOLDIER OF LUCK

No man in any of Mexico's countless rebellions and revolts has gone through a more complete change of circumstance than has Pancho Villa in the last five months, and to few men has there ever been given a more kaleidoscopic career in a life time than this desperado diplomatist has jammed into the last five years of his existence.

Escaping from United States border patrols and Mexican federal infantry and cavalry last March, Villa took the field with a single horse, which had been "borrowed," two sacks of flour and nine men. Last month he returned with upward of 10,000 followers, mostly well armed, quick moving cavalrymen, 38 large field pieces, 50 rapid fire machine guns, a trainload of ammunition, other trainloads of supplies for his troops and more than $5,000,000 in Mexican money.

Villa's record of triumphs in the last year is all the more wonderful when it is considered that it was done almost entirely with ammunition and artillery taken from the enemy's far stronger force.

"Pancho" is of magnetic personality, cunning, resourceful and alert. He has some of the capacity of Stonewall Jackson for driving his men on forced marches and appearing suddenly at the unexpected places, striking a telling blow, then disappearing utterly, only to be heard from a week later miles away doing more damage. He has the nerve to make a bold attack, but even his friends say he will run to avoid a pitched battle with a force of equal size.

'KILLER' WHALE NO MEAN FOE

Diaries of Captain Scott Tell Remarkable Story of Their Strength and Vindictiveness.

The whale is usually supposed to be an innocuous animal, and not lightly would we assail a character for virtue that has been well established. But Captain Scott's diaries show that the "killer" whale is a veritable demon, and an intelligent demon at that. He tells us that on one occasion the ship's photographer, Ponting, and two dogs were on an ice floe when they were attacked by six or seven whales. The method of assault was ingenious. The animals swam under the ice and smashed it by blows from their bodies with the evident intention of shaking their victims into the water. "Then it was clear that the whales shared our astonishment, for one after another their huge, hideous heads shot vertically into the air through the cracks which they had made. As they reared them to a height of six or eight feet it was possible to see their tawny head markings, their small, glistening eyes, and their terrible array of teeth—by far the largest and the most terrifying in the world. There cannot be a doubt that they looked up to see what had happened to Ponting and his dogs. . . . That they could display such deliberate cunning, that they were able to break ice of such thickness (at least two and a half feet) and that they could act in unison were a revelation to us."

A Change.

"Yes, Jim was once very wild, but where he is now, I hear he is quite guarded in his conduct."

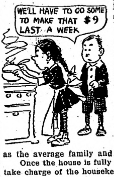
"Where is he?"

"In the penitentiary."

WASHINGTON CITY SIDELIGHTS

To Work Out Problems Confronting the Poor

WASHINGTON.—"Model House," the four-room sociological laboratory, in which the workers of Neighborhood House intend to work out the problems that confront Washington's poor, was opened to the public for inspection December 15. The trustees of Neighborhood House at a previous meeting decided that the inspection should follow a public reception in Neighborhood House on that date.



WE'LL HAVE TO GO SOME TO MAKE THAT $9 LAST A WEEK

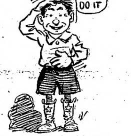
"Model House" is a two-story, four-room building, typical of the "alley houses" of the capital, in which many of the city's less prosperous are forced to live. In this house the settlement workers are to carry on a series of experiments to determine the cheapest and best way for the poor man and his family to live.

The carpenters worked hard to bring the house up to the standard of sanitation, that the workers feel should be demanded of every landlord. Then, it was to be furnished on a scale that it was figured the man who supports a family of wife and three children on $9 per week, which taken as the average family and wage of the alley inhabitants.

Once the house is fully furnished the boys and girls of the settlement will take charge of the housekeeping under the instruction of settlement officials. Daily meals will be cooked, care being taken by the young housewives to keep well within the $9 weekly wage, and such sewing as would be necessary for the family of father, mother and three children will be done.

Georgian Defies a Sacred Southern Tradition

WILLIAM C. ADAMSON, representing the Fourth district of Georgia and uniformly called "Jedge" Adamson because of his service on the city bench of Carrollton back in the eighties, is the one man in congress who defies the sacred southern tradition that no statesman should appear in anything but a large black felt slouch hat.



"Jedge" Adamson prefers a flat, drab golf cap, which he wears with the same nonchalance that he wears his large and unpressed trousers of Carroll county (Ga.) design.

Once, long years ago, the little William Adamson was taken to school for the first time by his parents. It was a country school where the birch rod had full sway. Little William, being left to his devices, made an experiment with his hands. He patted the top of his head and rubbed his stomach at the same time, which requires great muscular control.

The big boys and girls around him caught sight of the phenomenal exhibition, and in less than ten minutes nearly every pupil in that log schoolhouse was trying the Adamson trick with varying degrees of success. At the end of ten minutes the large and raw-boned schoolmaster had despaired of getting order again and started in to whale his school with a fine and unyielding bit of birch.

It is history that about every pupil caught a taste of that birch rod except the innocent looking William Adamson.

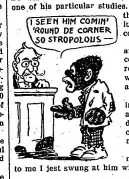
Long years passed. Little William had become a congressional leader. He accepted and told the story of his first day in school, and illustrated it with a fine demonstration of patting his head and rubbing his stomach.

The fever caught the school again the very next day. Every scholar who heard the "jedge" tried the trick. It nearly broke up the classes for a month after.

And now, says "Jedge" Adamson, the principal of that school wouldn't have his famous alumnus make another address there for any consideration unless he ties his hands.

Traces Peculiar Dialect of the Southern Negro

REPRESENTATIVE JAMES L. BYRNES of South Carolina comes from a state in which there is a vast negro population and their dialect has been one of his particular studies. In some sections there are words used among them that are almost unknown to the whites and it would be impossible for a northern visitor to comprehend a word of their speech.



I SEEN HIM COMIN' 'ROUND DE CORNER SO STROPOLOUS—

Tracing back the occurrence of similar words among the Jamaica negroes, he has arrived at the conclusion that many of them did not come directly here from Africa, but that their ancestors were first imported to Jamaica and their descendants brought over to the coast of Carolina.

He tells of some odd words of their manufacturing. In a case in court the defendant, tried for assault, was a husky man whose jargon was most difficult to understand. He had tried to brain a companion with an ax. When asked about the matter he squared himself off and replied:

"Well, jedge, I seen him coming 'round the corner so stropolous, and as soon as he got catacopus to me I jest swung at him wid de ax."

Letter With Picture Address Reaches President

OF all the thousands of letters that arrive in the White House mail bags, the most unusual arrived several days ago from Wichita, Kan. It has no written address. The sender, however, sketched on the face of the envelope a good likeness of President Wilson, together with certain symbols indicating its destination. The clerks of the railway mail service had no difficulty in deciding where it was to go, and sent it to the Washington postoffice. When it reached here it was sent to the White House. The president smiled when he saw it, but made no comment. Who sent the letter is a mystery. There was nothing inside, although the envelope was marked "personal." Several years ago, when Theodore Roosevelt was president, a similar letter was received at the White House. It had no written address, but merely a pair of large eye-glasses and a set of prominent teeth, which had been made popular by the cartoonists. Its detination was plain and it arrived at the White House without delay. The directions in the letter to President Wilson read, when the "picture writing" was translated, "Woodrow Wilson. Care of Uncle Sam, United States of America." The postal clerks, who are accustomed to reading handwriting which is far more difficult to decipher, caught the meaning without trouble and were spared even the detail of referring to a city directory. Letters are constantly received which bear the names of persons and the numbers of streets, but neglect to mention any city or town or even state. Such letters often reach the right persons.

WORLD HAS HAD A FORTUNATE YEAR

No Terrible Catastrophe Has Marked the Twelvemonth.

DEATH TAKES NOTABLE MEN

General Success of the Democrats and Startling Developments South of the Rio Grande Chief Events in Western Hemisphere.

New York.—Taken all in all, the year 1913 has been a happy and rather fortunate one for the world in general. It was not marked by any great catastrophe, such as the San Francisco earthquake or the Titanic disaster; it saw the end of the wars in the Balkans, it witnessed the inauguration of a Democratic president in the United States, followed by genuine tariff reduction without financial panic.

The death roll for the past year has hit the financial world rather hard, including such notable figures as J. P. Morgan, Henry M. Flagler and James R. Keene. The Roman Catholic church also lost two of its most venerable cardinals, Oreglia, dean of the sacred college, and Rampolla, once secretary at the Vatican and who would have been pope instead of Pius X had not the emperor of Austria voted against him.

In the United States political developments have been extremely interesting, but not startling. Everything seems to have gone the way of the Democrats. Democratic victories were won last November in New York city, the state of New Jersey and state of Massachusetts. Congress has passed the currency bill, and the banking interests of the country are adjusting themselves to it.

As alarmed as high finance may have been when it was learned that President Wilson believed in Sherman law should be "clarified," business and financial interests have apparently become convinced that the president's attitude is not one of opposition, but rather an attitude in which he would consult and confer with business and finance to remedy evils generally admitted to exist.

Doings in Mexico.

South of the Rio Grande developments have been startling and rapid. The year 1913 saw in Mexico the assassination of President Francisco Madero, Vice-President Pino Suarez and Gustavo Madero, brother of the president, the usurpation of the presidency by Gen. Victoriano Huerta, boosted into that position by General Felix Diaz. Then came the rupture between Diaz and Huerta, with the practical banishment of Diaz. Later in 1913 came the rise of Venustiano Carranza, leader of the constitutionalists in the north of Mexico, with the result that the powerful northern states of Mexico are now under his control. Scarcely had Carranza become famous than Francisco "Pancho" Villa, former bandit, with a price on his head, leaped into the limelight as a rebel leader serving Carranza, and it is now questioned whether Carranza or Villa is the stronger in the leadership of the constitutionalist forces.

In its relations with Mexico the United States has stood firm. Early in his administration President Wilson announced his determination to withhold recognition from the Huerta administration, and although much pressure has been brought to bear, the president has refused to change his attitude. Efforts have been made to induce Huerta to retire and allow a fair and honest election, without result. Today the United States has a heavy armed force at the border and an impressive array of battleships off the coast.

There have been several marriages of importance in the past year, and a number of engagements of prominent persons announced. Foremost in the minds of Americans, of course, is the wedding of Miss Jessie Woodrow Wilson, daughter of the president.

Assassinations of the Year.

Barring Mexico's barbarous achievements, there have been few assassinations in countries generally recognized as being civilized. George I, king of Greece, was assassinated by a mad anarchist in Salonika, March 18. In Turkey the commander-in-chief of the Ottoman forces in the Balkan wars, Enver Bey, was slain on February 17. This was followed soon after by the assassination of Nazim Pasha, Turkish premier. Turkey and Mexico appear to have been contending with each other for honors in the line of assassination, with Mexico slightly in the lead.

European affairs have gone along rather as usual, barring a few extra startling outbursts by suffragists in England, such as the sensational suicide of the young suffragette who threw herself before the king's horse in the derby and was killed. Politically England has been in a furor, which, however, is nothing out of the ordinary. The year has seen the very remarkable "rebellion" of Ulster, under the direction of Sir Edward Carson, and the organization of an "army" of Ulstermen to resist enforcement of the home rule bill should it pass parliament.

England has also had its share of labor troubles. There have been large strikes at home and in Ireland, notably the Dublin riots, led by Jim Larkin. All of the European powers have gone on as heretofore in the construction of battleships, and the "armed camp" policies of Germany, England, France and Russia are stronger than ever, possibly made so by the Balkan wars.

There have been some few spats between France and Germany, but nothing in any way approaching a breach of diplomatic relations. The falling of a couple of German war balloons on French territory created some little excitement, as did the mobbing of some German subjects by French citizens in border towns. France, as well as the United States, underwent a presidential election in 1913, placing a very democratic and a very diplomatic person in the office of chief executive—President Poincare.

In the Far East.

In the far east several things of moment occurred in 1913, among them the Chinese rebellion and establishment of a republic, and in Japan the death of the Mikado and the succession of his son and the anti-American demonstrations and riots as a result of the adoption of the anti-alien landowning law in California.

In the realm of science and exploration there have been but few developments that could positively be designated as history-creating.

The discovery of the south pole and the disaster to the Scott expedition both occurred in 1912, although the fate of Captain Scott was not made known to the world until 1913. Dr. Fredrich Franz Friedmann, discoverer of a "cure" for tuberculosis, made his appearance in 1913, but the value of Dr. Friedmann's "cure," and other "cures" for that dread disease announced at about the same time, are very much open to doubt. Great strides have undoubtedly been made in the treatment of cancer, but no positive cure has yet been discovered, although much has been learned about the value of radium.

Aviation is progressing rapidly. Much attention to aeronautics has been paid by the various European governments from a military standpoint, but no means of making aeroplaning anywhere near safe have yet been discovered. France has organized and trained a military aviation corps that would unquestionably be of great value in case of war, and Germany has devoted much time and money to dirigible ballooning. The United States has spent some $50,000 during the year in military experiments in aviation.

The number of deaths resulting from aviation has not been especially large. Aviators have died, just as aviators died in 1912, and Germany suffered a number of disastrous accidents to Zeppelin dirigible balloons. Many of the accidents of aeroplanes resulted from fancy exhibition flying and military experiments. The year 1913 saw the first aeroplane flight over the Panama canal.

On the Panama Canal.

In Panama great developments have taken place. October 10 last saw the dynamiting of Gamboa dike, being the removal of practically the last serious obstruction in the big ditch. The canal is now almost completed, so far as a trans-continental waterway is concerned, although not yet prepared for the passage of steamers from ocean to ocean. Work has also been begun on the buildings and grounds for the great Panama-Pacific International exposition, to be held in San Francisco in 1915, as a celebration of the formal opening of the Panama canal. In this connection it may be mentioned some slight international ill feeling may have been caused by the refusal of the British and German government to participate officially in the San Francisco exposition. German and English merchants, however, will take part on their own accounts.

The United States may congratulate itself that, barring the case of Hans Schmidt, the New York priest, there have been few gruesome and startling murders during the year.

New York state furnished the most sensational bit of local politics of the year in the impeachment and removal of Gov. William Sulzer, followed by Sulzer's nomination by Progressives and election to the state assembly.

In the world of sports the United States still stands supreme. In addition to humbling the British polo cup challengers, the United States further shocked Johnny Bull when Francis Ouimet, the youthful golf wonder, walked away from the English experts in the national open golf championship at Brookline, Mass., and by the winning of the international Davis tennis cup. America's supremacy in sports was further recognized during the year when King Gustave of Sweden presented the American athletes with the medals and trophies won at the Olympic games in Stockholm in 1912. The sporting world suffered a shock, however, when it was learned that "Jim" Thorpe, the famous Carlisle Indian athlete really belonged in the classification of "professional." He voluntarily renounced the trophies he had won as an amateur in the Olympic games.

Here are the leading events of the year:

Disasters, Fires, Floods.

Floods in Ohio, many killed, much suffering and great damage done.

Floods in the Mississippi valley as a result of Ohio floods.

Tornado destroys part of Omaha, Neb.

Zeppelin L-2 exploded October 7. Twenty killed.

Gas explosion near Pittsburgh kills 120 miners.

Long Beach, Cal., pier gives way, killing 35 persons.

Disastrous floods in Texas, early part of October.

Firedamp in Welsh mine entombs 931. Five hundred rescued alive.

Two hundred and eighty miners entombed following mine explosion at Dawson, N. M. Twenty-three rescued alive.

Steamship Nevada strikes a mine in Gulf of Smyrna. One hundred and twenty drowned.

Steamer Volturno burned at sea October 18. One hundred and thirty-six drown, 625 rescued.

Storm at Nome, Alaska, kills 11, destroys 500 houses, $1,500,000 loss.

The Death Roll.

Enver Bey, chief of staff Turkish army, assassinated February 17.

Henry N. Flagler, one of founders of Standard Oil company, and financial magnate, dies.

George I., king of Greece, assassinated by mad anarchist at Salonika, March 18.

James R. Keene, financier, dies January 2.

Deaths of Cardinals Oreglia, dean of the Sacred college, and Rampollo, within a few days of each other at the Vatican.

Luther McCarthy, pugilist, died at Alberta May 24.

Death of emperor of Japan.

Nazim Pacha, Turkish premier, assassinated.

King Menelik of Abbyssinia reported dead. His death confirmed on December 23.

Whitelaw Reid, American ambassador to Great Britain, buried at Sleepy Hollow cemetery, N. Y.

Adolphus Busch, millionaire brewer of St. Louis, died October 10.

Charles G. Gates, son of the late John W. Gates, died October 28.

Ralph Rose, famous athlete and champion shot putter, died October 16.

Timothy Woodruff, New York politician, died October 12.

Anthony N. Brady, died in London, July 22.

Col. S. F. Cody, American aviator, killed in England by fall from aero August 7.

Mayor Gaynor of New York died on way to England.

Timothy D. Sullivan, New York politician, found dead on railroad track after escaping from an asylum.

DENSMORE FAILS TO SETTLE STRIKE

SOLICITOR FOR DEPARTMENT OF LABOR LEAVES MICHIGAN COPPER DISTRICT.

GOVERNOR FERRIS TO SCENE

Decision of Executive to Visit Upper Peninsula Comes as a Result of Government Representative's Inability to Succeed.

Houghton, Mich., Jan. 6.—Copper mine owners of northern Michigan made a mistake in refusing peace plans proffered by the Western Federation of Miners in the judgment of John B. Densmore, solicitor for the department of labor, pronounced a few hours before his departure for Washington. For the first time since his arrival in the district, Mr. Densmore broke silence as to the conditions he found there.

A Like Situation.

"A generation ago the anthracite mine operators of Pennsylvania adopted precisely the attitude taken by the copper mine managers," he said. "Similar stands have marked the action of employing interests in the initial strikes of practically every big industry.

"The idea seemed to be that by winning the first strike the employer crushed the union. Speaking entirely from the historical point of view I think I can safely say this course has failed.

"Almost invariably they have come back for another struggle, sometimes in a year, perhaps not for five years, or even later. But come back they do.

Owners Should Understand.

"It seems a pity therefore that the copper country must sooner or later face another struggle even if this one results in a seemingly complete victory for the mine owners."

That the outcome of the present strike will not be settled without a bitter fight is again indicated. Company managers rested on their plans for filling up working forces with non-union men from outside places. Union circles were more active and meetings were held in Hancock in the morning and in Calumet in the afternoon.

The strength of the entire labor movement of the country was pledged to the copper country men and they were urged to stand firm despite possible suffering and privation. It was announced that enough resources are in sight to keep the strike going for at least another year.

Governor to Strike Region.

Big Rapids, Mich.—In the effort to effect a settlement of the miners' strike, Governor Woodbridge N. Ferris left for the Upper Michigan copper country. This decision to go to the scene followed the news that John B. Densmore, solicitor of the federal department of labor, had failed to bring about a solution of the trouble.

Governor Ferris was accompanied only by his private secretary, but James V. Cunningham, state commissioner of labor, has been notified to start at once for Calumet.

Governor Invited Repeatedly.

The governor repeatedly has been asked by the labor men to visit the copper country and learn conditions at first hand, but heretofore has declined to do so.

"I am going to the copper country simply as the governor of Michigan," said Mr. Ferris. "I am not going as the representative of the labor unions, of the miners, or of the mine workers. I am going as the representative of every citizen of the state, workmen, farmers, business and professional men, to learn all I can."

PRESIDENT'S HEALTH NORMAL

Busy Week for Chief Executive as He Will Spend More Time on Business.

Pass Christian, Miss., Jan. 6.—President Wilson looks forward to a busy week. He is benefiting so much by his vacation that each day he is tackling more and more of the documents and data of various sorts which he brought with him for leisurely study.

The chief executive's health is normal again; in fact those who have been with him for many months say he never looked better. His skin shows the glow of health, and his jaunty step and vigorous stroke on the golf links confirm his return to physical strength.

Sunday Mr. Wilson surprised the little town of Biloxi, twenty-five miles from the president's cottage here, by dropping in unexpectedly at the services of the First Presbyterian church there. The little church was not filled when the president and his family arrived, but word of their coming spread through the village and soon all the seats and available standing room were occupied.

Missouri Cold Storage Probe.

Jefferson City, Mo., Jan. 5.—The cold storage business, especially as it affects the cost of living, will be the subject of a thorough investigation by the Missouri bureau of labor statistics some time during the current year. This investigation will be conducted for the enlightenment of the public rather than for the prosecution of those engaged in the cold storage business, according to a bulletin just issued by Labor Commissioner John T. Fitzpatrick.

WONDERFUL GROWTH OF THE CANADIAN WEST

The Cities of Western Canada Reflect the Growth of the Country.

As one passes through Western Canada, taking the City of Winnipeg as a starting point, and then keeping tab on the various cities and towns that line the network of railways that cover the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and covering the eyes as the gaze is bent on these it is felt that there must be "something of a country" behind it all. Then gaze any direction you like and the same view is presented. Field after field of waving grain, thousands and hundreds of thousands of them. Farm hands and laborers are at work converting the virgin prairie with more fields. Pasture land in every direction on which cattle are feeding, thriving and fattening on the grasses that are rich in both milk and beef properties, but it is unfortunate that more cattle are not seen. That, however, is correcting itself. Here we have in a large measure, the evidence of the wealth that helps to build up the cities, and it should not be forgotten that the cities themselves have as citizens, young men who have come from other parts, and brought with them the experience that has taught them to avoid the mistakes of eastern and southern cities. They also are imbued with the western spirit of enterprise, energy and push, and so Western Canada has its cities. At a banquet recently given in Chicago, a number of prominent citizens of Winnipeg were guests. Among the speakers was Mayor Deacon of Winnipeg. In speaking of the remarkable growth of that city, which in thirty years has risen from a population of 2,000 to one of 200,000, he spoke of it as being the gateway of commerce and continued:

"Now, how great that tide of commerce is you will have some conception of when I tell you that the wheat alone grown in the three prairie provinces this year is sufficient to keep a steady stream of one thousand bushels per minute continuously night and day going to the head of the lakes for three and one-half months, and in addition to that the oats and barley would supply this stream for another four months.

"The value of the grain crop alone grown in the three prairie provinces would be sufficient to build any of our great transcontinental railroads and all their equipment, everything connected with them, from ocean to ocean.

"Now, if we are able to do this with only ten per cent. of our arable land under cultivation what will our possibilities be when 288,000,000 of acres of the best land that the sun shines on is brought under the plow? Do you not see the portent of a great, vigorous, populous nation living under those sunny skies north of the 49th parallel? And if with our present development we are able to do as we are doing now, to purchase a million dollars' worth of goods from you every day of the year, what will our trade be worth when we have fully developed the country?

"Now, who shall assist us to develop this great empire that is there? Shall it be the alien races of southern Europe or shall it be men of our own blood and language? In the last three fiscal years no less than 358,000 American farmers have come into Western Canada, bringing with them goods and cash to the value of $350,000,000. And I want to say here that no man who sets foot on our shores is more entirely and heartily welcome than the agriculturist from the south.

"So long as these conditions remain I consider that this is the best guaranty that the sword will never again be drawn in anger between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. The grain crops of Western Canada in 1913 have well upheld the reputation that country has for abundant yields of all small grains.—Advertisement.

CHAPTER I.

The Prophecy.

Half a dozen high, little French voices floated shrilly out into the garden, on a sunshiny morning of 1820 from the great entry of an old farmhouse in the valley under the Jura mountains. The grandmother, sitting white-capped in the center of the hubbub, heard one more willingly than the others, for not only was Francois her best loved, but also the story he asked for was the story she liked to tell.

Smiling, the grandmother began: "You must know, my children, that it was on a day in the month of May, in the year 1813, that he came. You, Lucie, and you, Pierre, and Marie were not born, only Francois and Tomas. Francois was the older—not quite three years old. The mother had gone to care for your Aunt Lucie, who was ill, and I kept the house for your father. It was the year of the great conscription, when the emperor took all the men to fight, not only the strong ones, but the boys, and the old and infirm, if they might but drag themselves at the tail of a regiment. So the few men who were not under the flag were sorely needed by their families, for it was necessary, if the women and children were not to starve, that some should stay to work in the fields. Your father was of the few who had escaped in our village of Vicques.

"One morning a man appeared in the village and said that Napoleon would pass this way within a few hours.

"Outside I heard the neighbors calling the same two words—'Napoleon comes'—one called it to another. If the trumpet of the angel sounded the end of the world, they could not have had more fear. Then your father kissed me, and kneeled and held you, Francois, and Tomas, in his arms, and I saw tears, but he was brave—but yes. 'Courage, little mother,' he said, 'for me and for the babies. Courage.'

"And at that your father, who was my little lad once, you know, my dears, had gone, and I stood with an ache where my heart should have been, and for a moment I was stupid and could not think.

"As I stood so, like a blow there was a rush of galloping horses in a shower of noise down the street, and my heart stopped, for the horses drew up at this house. So that I was still in the middle of the floor when the door opened.

"It opened, that door there, and against the light I saw men crowding in the entry. They wore uniforms of bright colors, and swords hung at their sides, and on their heads were hats with trimmings of gold. Then I saw—Napoleon. With a step toward me he spoke in a kind voice, half smiling.

"'Madame,' he said, 'will you let us use this room and this table for an hour? You shall not be disturbed in your work.'

"I made my courtesy to these great gentlemen as I had been taught, and I found myself saying quite easily to his majesty the emperor, as easily as if I talked to Monsieur le Cure, to whom I was accustomed, that he was welcome; that I would serve him gladly if he wished to command me. And then I left them. I went into the kitchen and began to get dinner, but I was so dazed that I could not seem to make the soup as usual. When, suddenly, I heard a child cry, and with no thought then but of my babies, I flew to the door of the great room and stood looking, for I could not pass the sentinel.

"Among the officers in their uniforms there lay on the floor little Francois in his night-dress, and all the officers looked at him and laughed. The child, sleeping in the farther room, had waked at the voices and had climbed down from his crib and toddled out to see. The glitter of the uniforms must have pleased him, and as they all bent over the papers on the table he had pulled at the sword of one whom I afterward knew to be the great Marshal Ney. He wore a dark coat all heavy with gold lace, my children, and white pantaloons and high shining black boots, and across his breast a scarlet ribbon. He sat next the emperor. The marshal, turning sharply at the tug, knocked the little one over. It was then Francois cried out.

"Napoleon himself who spoke as I peered under the sentinel's arm. He shook his finger at his officer.

"'Marshal, Marshal,' he cried, 'are you not too quick to overthrow so young a soldier, so full of love for arms?'

"The emperor seemed to joke, for he laughed a little, yet there was a sound in his voice as if some part was serious. He turned sharply to the mayor. 'What is the child's name?'

"The mayor was our friend and knew the babies. 'Francois Beaupre, sire,' he answered tremblingly.

"The emperor gave a short nod, 'Make him kneel,' he said. 'Marshal, your sword.'

"It was still for a moment, and all the officers stood up silent, and then the emperor took the marshal's sword and struck the baby's shoulder a light blow with the flat of it.

"'Rise Chevalier Francois Beaupre,' he said clearly, and in the pause he added, with a look in his eyes as if one gazed forward: 'Some day, perhaps, a marshal of France under another Bonaparte.'"

CHAPTER II.

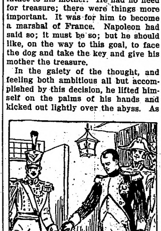
The Stranger.

On an afternoon in July in the year of 1820, Francois, being ten years old and a dreamer, came alone through the gate and sat down with his short legs dangling over an ancient wall, fifteen feet sheer down. He sat there, quite comfortable and secure, and kicked his heels, and thought of his brilliant future, and also of the story of the great dog and the treasure. The tradition ran that ages back, in the time of Caesar, fifty years after Christ, a Roman governor in this Gallic province had built a formidable castle on this hill outside the village. The castle had great granaries to hold the grain which the governor tortured from the peasants and sent to Rome to sell. So he grew rich by oppression, and the gold wrung from the people he piled in cellars deep in his castle. When it came to be a great amount he sent far to the north and got a huge dog, and this dog he trained to a terrible fierceness, so that anyone coming near in the long underground corridors where he guarded the treasure was sure to be torn in pieces, except always the governor.

For years things went on in this way, the governor grinding the peasants, and the giant dog guarding him and his treasure, till at last there came a thunderbolt—the governor was sent for to come to Rome to give an account of the riches which he had kept from the emperor. He had to go, but he left the dog in charge, and the night after he was gone the peasantry gathered and set fire to the chateau and burned it to the ground, and the dog and the treasure were buried in it, and there they are to this day. The people of Vicques believe that if a man will go to dig that treasure and will stay till midnight, that at twelve exactly a colossal dog will rise from the ruined stones and come, breathing flames; in his mouth will be the key of the treasure-vault, and back of him will stand the ghost of the Roman governor wrapped in white, his face covered. And if the man will be bold enough to take the key from the flaming mouth, then dog and governor will vanish in a clap of thunder, and in front of the daring one will rise the door of the treasure-vault, and he may turn the key and go in and help himself.

Francois considered, and, feeling no fear in his soul, decided that he was the man destined to take the key out of the dog's mouth and get the treasure, which he would at once transfer intact to his mother. He had no need for treasure; there were things more important. It was for him to become a marshal of France. Napoleon had said so; it must be so; but he should like, on the way to this goal, to face the dog and take the key and give his mother the treasure.

In the gaiety of the thought, and feeling both ambitious all but accomplished by this decision, he lifted himself on the palms of his hands and kicked out lightly over the abyss. As he kicked there was a sudden strong grip on his shoulder; he was jerked backward and rolled on the grass.



"Rise, Chevalier Francois Beaupre!"

"Are you tired of life at this age then?" a strident voice demanded, and Francois lay on his back and regarded, wondering, at ease, the bronzed lined face of a big man standing over him. Francois smiled; then laughed with assurance of the other's friendliness up into the strange man's face. He got to his feet and stood.

"No, m'sieur," he said politely. "I was only pleased at thinking what I am going to be some day."

"Ah! Is it permitted to ask what magnificence it is that you are to be?"

"Certainly it is permitted, m'sieur," Francois answered in his courageous, courteous way. "I shall one day be a 'marshal of France' under another Bonaparte.'"

The stranger watched him, astonished, and then he laid his hand on the slim shoulder in its homespun blouse, and his grave voice was gentle. "My child, be careful how you say words like those; you may get your father into trouble. It is a good belief to keep in one's heart, and you and I may yet shout 'Vive l'Empereur' for a Napoleon again. Yes, who knows? But I must go on. Good day, my friend, the marshal."

CHAPTER III.

Without Fear.

The gilder was at work gilding the great ball on top of the church steeple. Every twenty years this had to be done, and it was an event in the village. Moreover, it was dangerous, and, like all dangers, fascinating.

The boys of Vicques stood in groups in the street with their heads bent back, watching the tiny figure of a man that crept up an invisible ladder far in the air, lashed to the side of the steeple. Up and up it went, like a fly, crawling on the fleche, and there was a sinking feeling in each boy's stomach which was delightful, to think how at any moment that creeping black spot which was the gilder might fall down, down, and be dashed to pieces.

Achille Dufour suggested, "Even Francois would not dare climb that ladder to the ball. Dare you?"

The great brown eyes of Francois turned about the group; the boys waited eagerly for his answer. It was always this one who led into the dangerous places; always this one who went a bit further when the others' courage failed.

"I dare," said Francois. Then the dark heads came together in an uneasy mass, and there was whispering.

At the dinner-hour that day several mothers of the village remarked that their small lads were restless, not intent as usual on the black bread and the soup of chopped vegetables and the green beans—all anxious to finish and get away. Only the mother of Francois, however, reasoned from this that mischief was brewing. When the slim, wiry, little figure slipped from the table and out through the open door, she rose and followed and stood in the great entry watching him race across the field toward the church. He veered but once in his straight path—to turn to the Prilpoteaux cottage, where the gilder lodged while in Vicques.

"How soon will one be at work up there again?" he asked through the window of Auguste Philpoteaux sitting at his dinner, and the man answered good-naturedly:

"It may be in half an hour, my boy, Not sooner." And Francois raced on.

By this time a boy here and a boy there had stolen from their dinner tables and were gathering in groups down the street, but the elders paid no attention. Francois disappeared into the church; the boys began to grow breathless.

"It will take some minutes for the stairs," one said, and they waited. Two minutes, three, perhaps five; something rose out of the trap-door leading to the platform from which the steeple sprang—a figure, looking very small so far up above them. Instantly it attached itself, like a crawling fly, to the side of the steeple; it moved upward. Henri Dufour, below in the street, jumped as a hand gripped his arm. He looked up frightened at La Claire.

"Is that my Francois?" she demanded sternly, but the boy did not need to answer.

With that, by degrees people came from the cottages as at some mysterious warning and stood silent, afraid to breathe, watching the little figure creeping up, up the dizzy narrowing peak of the church steeple. A rider galloped down the road; seeing the groups, he pulled in his bay horse and his eyes followed the upward glance of the whole village.

"Who is it?" he flung at the nearest knot of peasants; his voice was abrupt and commanding.

The men pulled off their caps, and one answered respectfully: "It is little Francois Beaupre, my seigneur; it is a child who has no fear; he is almost at the top, but we dread it when he descends."

"Mon dieu!" the man on horseback growled. "If he looks down he is lost; the lad is a born hero or a born lunatic."

The crawling spot up there showed dark in the sunlight against the new gilding of the ball. It stopped; the blot was fixed for a second; another second. From the crowd rose gasps, and excited broken sentences.

"He has the vertigo! He is lost!"

The dark blot clung against the gilding. Then suddenly it moved, began to make a slow way downward, and a long sigh, like a ripple on water, ran through the ranks of people. No one spoke; all the eyes watched the little figure slip down, down the unseen ladder in the air. At last it was at the bottom; it disappeared into the trap-door. Every one began to talk volubly at once; a woman cried for joy, then a child spoke in a high voice.

"See," she said, shrilly, "the mother of Francois goes to meet him!"

Le Claire was far down the street, gliding toward that church door which was under the steeple. As she reached it the little lad came out, his face flushed, his eyes shining with excitement and triumph. She took his hand silently, hardly looking at him, and turned so, quietly, without a word of either joy or reproof, her face impassive. She had got her boy again from the dead, it seemed to Claire, and those first moments were beyond words or embraces. To touch his warm hand was enough. The man on the bay horse, trotting slowly along, saw the meeting.

"It is a woman out of the common, that one," he spoke aloud. "She rules herself and the boy." And the boy looked up as he came and smiled and tugged at his cap with the hand which his mother did not hold.

"Good morning, m'sieur," he said with friendliness, and the rider stared.

"Sacre bleu!" he flung back in his strong sudden voice. "It is my friend, the marshal. Was it you, then, glued up there? Yet another fashion to play with death, eh? Nom d'un chien! You have a star of good luck—you are saved for something great, it must be."

"M'sieur the Marshal," he flung at Francois. "Come and see me in the chateau."

There was a clatter of galloping hoofs; the bay mare and her rider were far down the street.

"Who is it, my mother—the fierce gentleman?" Francois asked.

"You are fortunate today, Francois," Claire answered him. "The good God has saved your life from a very great foolishness, and also I think you have made a friend. It is the new seigneur."

CHAPTER IV.

Coming to His Own.

Six years ago, before Waterloo, Napoleon had given the new chateau of Vicques and its lands to general the Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, whom he had before then fashioned into a very good pattern of a soldier out of material left over from the old aristocracy. Vicques lay in the Valley Delesmontes—"of the mountains"—a league from the little city Delesmontes, whose six thousand inhabitants constituted it the chief city of this valley of the Jura. Over Vicques hung the mountain called Le Rose, behind Le Rose loomed that greater mountain called Le Raimeu; back of Le Raimeu rolled the Jura range.

The Baron-General Gourgaud, taking possession of the chateau in this month of July, thought it lucky he had not seen this domain of his before, else the vision would have turned his heart from his duty. After a full career almost in boyhood—for the Cross of the Legion of Honor had come to him at twenty-four—after service in the Spanish and Austrian campaigns and diplomatic missions; after saving the emperor's life at Moscow; after Waterloo, Napoleon had chosen him as one of three officers to go with him to St. Helena. The chateau and estate of Vicques had been given to him by the emperor after that brave and lucky moment at Moscow when, the first man to enter the Kremlin, he had snatched the match from a mass of gunpowder which would a moment later have blown up both officers and emperor.

Ten years before he had married; four years after that his wife had died, and the daughter she left was now a girl of seven, a fairy type of girl.

"You are perfect in every way but one, Alixe," he said, as he swung her high to kiss her. "You are—"

"I know," the little girl interrupted, comrade-like. "I know the fault I have. I am not a boy. But I do not wish to be a boy, father. I would then grow to be a great fierce person with a mustache—like you. Imagine me, father, with a mustache," and the two laughed together.

* * * * * *

"Father, father!" Alixe dashed into the library.

"There is a queer, little, village boy—but a good boy, father. He has brought you a bunch of lettuce—such white fat lettuce! Will you see him? He is a very good boy."

"Alixe, you are impayable," the general groaned. "I am your plaything! Yes, send for all the village—that will help me with my writing."

Alixe, ignoring sarcasm, had flown. In a minute she was back and led by the hand Francois.

"Ah!" the general greeted him sternly. "My friend, the marshal! You have already begun the attack on my chauteau, it seems?"

"No, my seigneur," the boy answered gravely. "Not yet. I bring you some salade as a present. It is from my mother's garden. I chose the best."

"I thank you," said the general with seriousness. "I am not sure if your mother will thank you equally. It is a good present."

Francois was gratified. Le Claire had this morning sent him to the gardens with a wide margin of time, and the inspiration had come as he looked down the gleaming row of white lettuce that he would take a tribute and make the visit which the seigneur had asked him to make.

General Gourgaud brought down his fist on a table so that it rattled and Francois started—but not Alixe.

"Sabre de bois!" he threw at the two children. "You have ruined my morning between you. I meant to finish those cursed chapters this morning. But let them wait. Having the honor to receive a visit from an officer of high rank, the least I can do is to entertain him. What amusement do you prefer, M'sieur the Marshal? I am at your service."

It was natural to Francois to believe every one kindly; he accepted with simplicity, if with slight surprise, the general's speech.

"The seigneur has fought battles under the great emperor himself?" the boy asked in an awed tone.

"Yes," came the abrupt answer.

"Think!" whispered the French boy. "To have fought under the emperor!" And the old soldier's heart thrilled suddenly. The child went on. "If the seigneur would tell me a story of one fight—of just one!"

"Ratisbon, Ratisbon!" clamored Alixe, and she scrambled over the arm of his chair to her father's knee and her hand went around his neck. "Tell about Ratisbon and the ditch and the ladders, father."

"Halt!" ordered the general. "I have not a week to talk. But I will tell about Ratisbon if you wish."

The deep voice stopped, then went on again. "The Austrians held Ratisbon and the bridge across the Danube river. The emperor wished to take the town and that bridge. Marshal Lannes was ordered to do it. You see, my children, the walls were very old but filled with Austrian artillery, and there was infantry on the parapets. An old ditch lay under the walls, a large ditch, dry, but twenty feet high and fifty feet wide. All the bottom of it was a vegetable garden. To take that town it was necessary to go down into that ditch and climb up again to the walls, and all the time one would be under fire from the Austrians on the walls—do you understand that, children? Very well. Twice the marshal asked for fifty volunteers to take the ladders and place them in the ditch. Twice one hundred men sprang forward, and it was necessary to choose the fifty. Twice they dashed out, carrying the ladders, from behind the great stone barn which had covered them, and each time the detail was wiped out—fifty men wiped out. It was like that, my children, the fight at Ratisbon."

"The emperor!" Francois breathed—"the emperor was there!"

Probably nothing, which had not to do with his daughter, could have touched General Gourgaud as did that tribute.

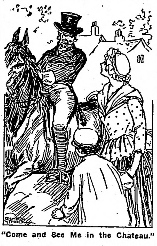
"Sapristi!" he growled. "The arm of the little corporal reaches a long way. The child has not even seen him, and voila, he loves him."

The child's face flushed. "But yes, my seigneur," Francois spoke quickly. "But yes. I have seen the emperor."

"You have seen Napoleon?" The general was surprised. "How is that?"

In a boyish fashion, in homely language of his class, yet with that dramatic instinct which is characteristically French, Francois told his tale as his grandmother had told it to him and to his brothers and sisters—the tale which the children called "Napoleon Comes." The general listened with a sincere interest.

"My boy," he addressed the lad, "I do not know the law—I am a soldier. Yet by my idea you are chevalier, created so by the act of the most powerful monarch who ever ruled France—by our Emperor Napoleon. The time may come when, as the emperor said, you may be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. But that is a small thing if the time comes when you may help another Bonaparte to come to his right, to rule over France. It is that of which you must think till the hour strikes, and then it is that which you must give your life for."



"Come and See Me in the Chateau."

Little Francois, the visionary, the hero worshiper, trembled. "I will do it, my seigneur," he said, frightened yet inspired, lifted into a tremendous dizzying atmosphere. And with that a secret which he had told no one, not even his mother, broke forth. "My seigneur, a strange thing happens sometimes—I have dreams—yet they are not dreams—in broad daylight. I see things—I hear voices—which are not of our village. Three times I saw a long road up a mountain, and over the mountain was a large star. I saw it three times, and once a voice said 'It is the star of the Bonapartes, but also your star, Francois. Follow it.'"

The general was a hard-headed person for all his cult of Napoleon, and vision-seeing appeared to him nonsense. He pooh-poohed at once the idea of a star divided between the house of Bonaparte and a small peasant. "Your mother had better put a wet cloth in your cap," he advised. "Parbleu—seeing stars in midday! Some one-legged old fighter has been gabbling before you about the star of the Bonapartes, and that and a touch of sunstroke in this heat, it may be, have turned you silly. Let me hear no more of stars, but keep at your lesson and learn to be—"

With that he was aware that the boy did not hear him. The light figure was on tiptoes—the large eyes stared at the wall, and the child spoke in an uninflected voice as if something muffled spoke through him.

"I see the star," he said. "I see it through a window where there are iron bars. . . . Ah!" The interjection was in the boy's natural accent, and he shivered violently. "Ugh!" His teeth chattered and he looked about vaguely. "It is like an icehouse. I do not like those dreams; they make me so cold. Seigneur, it is late; my mother will not be pleased. And I must stop at the garden and pick the vegetables for supper—carrots and peas. I must hurry to get the peas and carrots."

Little Alixe, clutching her father's thumb, watched as the boy disappeared. Then, to the general's astonishment, she began to sob. "I—I don't know," she answered his quick question. "But I—I think it is because I am sorry the little boy was so cold."

CHAPTER V.

A Game of Cards.

Francois Beaupre—Le Francois of Vicques—sober, laborious, had in him a certain pig-headedness, and also a vein of the gambler which had swollen with use; yet because it had so far brought him only good luck the neighbors called this good judgment. He was a dealer in working oxen; he bought and raised and sold them, and only his wife knew what chances he often took in buying young beeves. It was a simple solid form of speculation, yet it was that.

On a day in September he left Vicques early in the morning to drive to the market in Delesmontes, a league distant, two pairs of oxen which he had bought as calves for almost nothing from poor stock out of a farm leagues away. He had fed and trained and cared for them till now they were all well set-up and powerful and smooth-working—ready to sell for a good price. At the market he found that there were few oxen to be disposed of, none which compared to his, and his ideas of value went up—he would get nine hundred francs for them, which delayed the sale.

So it came to be, by the time his bargain was closed, three o'clock in the afternoon, and he had had no dinner. With the cattle off his hands and the money in his pocket he felt a sense of leisure and of wealth. Hungry as a wolf he felt also, and he turned into the inn of Delesmontes, where the sign of a huge bear, cut out of tin and painted black, swung before the door.

A waitress approached him—a sommelliere—trim in her short calico skirt and white apron, her hair done in the picturesque fashion of the place. The girl took his order; as she turned to go a man just coming in knocked against her, and apologizing with many words, caught sight of Francois.

"Good day!" he saluted him heartily. "Good day, Monsieur Beaupre," and Francois, friendly always, answered "Good day," but with a reserve, for he did not recall the man. "You don't remember me? That is natural, for we met but once. Yet I have not forgotten you. It was at the house of my cousin, Paul Noirjean of Devillier."

Now Paul Noirjean was an old acquaintance and a solid man, and though Beaupre did not see him often, living six leagues away, he respected him highly. A cousin of his was to be considered, and Francois was embarrassed that his memory could not focus on the meeting. He tried to cover this with cordiality, and invited the stranger to share his meal.

"Not at all, not at all," the other answered. "Yet we must have a bottle of wine together, but it shall be my bottle."

Francois objected; the man insisted. At length: "See, we will play cards for that bottle," the unknown man suggested, and the cards were brought, and a game of La rams—euchre—was in progress in two minutes.

Meanwhile the wine had come, and Francois, a touch more generous and more cordial for it, was genially sorry when he won and the stranger must pay.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

After January 1st the income tax becomes due. That is to say if your income exceeds $3000 a year your must pay taxes on all excess of that amount. We do not think that country editors and publishers will need to worry about paying an income tax.

If St. Paul keeps on digging up their police scandal, they may disclose as rotten a gang as was once in control of Minneapolis, and the poor fallen women are the ones that have furnished the money to corrupt the police in this case, while the gamblers furnished the funds in the Minneapolis case.

The promptness with which the Mexican federals, who were defeated by the rebels got chased back from American territory, to which they retreated, would indicate that President Wilson has the boys right on hand to look after American citizens and their interest. The wounded and noncombatants were given protection.

A grand jury has been called for term of Pennington Court which convenes on the 20th. The grand jury meets on the 28th, and is composed of a lot of good law abiding citizens, who will undoubtedly carefully investigate any crimes that are brought before them, and let no guilty man escape.

Wm. E. Lee, the Long Prairie statesman, threatens to file as a candidate for governor within a short time. Why not round up the entire bunch who ran last time, and so make a sure thing for the present incumbrance?—The Northern Light.

Sure they might as well try it again, as they will not have to go to the expense of having new cuts made of themselves, but can have printed under the old ones. Here is the same "sucker" that ran for governor two years ago that can't learn anything by experience.

AN ERRONEOUS IMPRESSION.

Answering notice of delinquency in subscription, we have received a reply to the effect that the party had ordered the paper for one year only and that he had supposed that the editor would have had the sense, which is expected of all editors, to anticipate his wishes and accordingly stop sending the paper. He had supposed, he goes on to say, that the paper had been sent to him free of charge, by which token it is understood that he mistakes this paper for a charitable institution and the publishing business for a means of diversion and pleasure. This party has been laboring under these ridiculous impressions for a period of three years, all unconscious of the subscription laws which have been published in these, as well as every other newspaper's columns, which state that this party was contracting a legitmate debt. In justice to our readers, let it be said that this the first instance of the kind, but in order that no others fall into this error, we publish, in part, this law relating to such cases:

"Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary are considered as wishing to renew their subscriptions.

"If subscribers order a discontinuance of their periodicals, the publisher may continue to send it until all dues are paid.

"If subscribers pay in advance they are bound to give notice at the end of that time if they do not wish to continue taking it, otherwise the subscriber will be responsible until an express notice with payment of all arrearages is sent to the publisher.—T. R. Falls News Press.

That Grand Jury will make a big bill of expense for the tax payers, but the ones that are taking an active interest in having it called will undoubtedly try to make it interesting for evil doers. So far as our acquaintance goes with them they are a very honorable body of men who will try to be just to all.

GRAND JURY CALLED.

BANKER PONIES.

Half Wild Horses That Trap Fish and Then Eat Them.

Along Albemarle sound, on the North Carolina coast there is mile after mile of low, sandy shore, where nothing grows except a coarse grass, a few salt water weeds and wild parsley. On these banks lives a strange breed of half wild horses, known as "banker ponies." These creatures are generally about twice the size of Shetland ponies.

Every year the herd owners drive the "bankers" into pens, brand the foals with the proper mark and catch some of the older animals to sell to the dealers. North Carolinians say that the beasts must be starved into eating grain, hay or grass, for they have always lived on the rank salt marsh grass of the marshes and on fish.

They catch the fish for themselves at low tide. With their hoofs they dig deep holes in the sand below high water mark. When the tide falls they greedily devour the fish that are stranded in these holes. Often they fight briskly over an especially tempting morsel.

In captivity these strange horses are intelligent, but seldom are even in temper. Once tamed, they make excellent draft animals, for they have a strength that is disproportionate to their size. Foals that are bred from bankers in captivity make valuable animals—strong, healthy, intelligent and far less vicious than their parents.—Youth's Companion.

Milk In Naples.

In Naples the cows and goats are led through the streets and milked at the doors of the houses. People lower their cans by a string from the upper windows; the animals are milked into the cans, which are then hauled up again.

The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.

Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D" also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.

We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires, you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.

IF YOU NEED TIRES don't buy any kind at any price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof tires on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for our big Tire and Sundry Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.

DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it NOW.

THE LOCAL NEWS.

We have a fine farm for sale in Deer Park township for only $21 per acre.

T. S. JACOBSON licensed auctioneer, Highlanding, Minn. Prompt attention given to auction sales of farm property.

FURS FURS FURS.

Take your Furs to John T. Lattimore at Erie. He will give you good prices and pay cash.

It tried awful hard to snow last night, but made a failure out of it.

Remember that you can get your feed ground at M. E. Hvland's on Mondays and Fridays.

This has been a banner winter for clearing up brush land, and the farmers have been improving it to good advantage.

We have a few more yearly subscriptions to Farm Stock and Home which we are going to give away to our subscribers who pay up their subscription.

There has been a good fall of snow at Duluth and in the pineries, which will make the winter's business in the logging woods lively for the next two months.

Three of Elling Klemmetson's children started to attend the Highlanding school on Monday morning. They drive by team about three miles.

The little snow we did have melted away on Wednesday leaving the ground entirely bare again, and the green grass starting to grow.

There was a pleasant surprise party given at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. K. M. Kratzer's on Saturday evening December 27th at which a very enjoyable evening was spent.

P. C. Halverson, who bought the Vaughan Bros, and Co. store at Highlanding is putting in new goods and getting ready to open up the store for business. Call and see him and get acquainted

There is to be a big ball at P. L. Wajnarowski's in the town of Hickory to-morrow night. Plenty of room for dancing and plenty of room for stabling your horses. All are invited.

We remarked to some new settlers from a warmer climate, two years ago, that that was an unusual cold winter, and last winter was just about as bad, but this winter Northern Minnesota has redeemed herself.

Andrew Letvig is digging a deep well on the farm of Rolf Hofstad in Deer Park township. He is trying this job where other deep well diggers failed to get water, but Andrew knows no such word as failing to get water when he starts digging a well.

Peter Eberhardt has bought all the "dead head" logs on the Red Lake River, and will raise them up next season. These logs make the best kind of lumber after they are dried out, but it appears from his notice published in another column that he wants the lumber himself.

August Wentzel who formerly lived here, and now resides at Fisher, met with a very serious accident on December 24th, by getting one of his feet badly bruised, which has confined him to the house ever since that time, but he is now on the way to recovery.

There was a large attendance of farmers at the Electric Line Railroad Meeting held at Highlanding yesterday, and a large number of shares were sold. We did not have time to attend, and it would have been no use for us to be there, for it takes money to buy shares, and a country publisher does not usually have a surplus of that article. The prospects seem to be good now for the building of the first twenty miles of the line this summer in time for the marketing of the next fall's crop.

Ljot Sigurdson was transacting business up in the town of River yesterday.

Rabbits are very plentiful this year and those who like rabbit stew can obtain plenty of them at a very little cost.

Northern Minnesota is badly in need of about a foot of snow to keep the old settlers from getting lonesome. We hope the weather clerk won't get excited, when he reads this, and send us a lot of blizzards, but a nice little snow storm.

NOTICE

The undersigned has purchased from the Thief River Falls, Crookston and Grand Forks Lumber Co's. all the deadhead logs in or along the Red Lake River, and any person caught sawing or removing any of these logs will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

Realistic Dream.

A Hanover college professor was annoyed by the pranks of a freshman in his classes. He resolved that if that individual would not reform he would "kick" him out of the class.

The other morning the professor was seen coming to college with a slight limp in his gait. He was met by a brother member of the faculty and asked why he was limping.

"I dreamed last night that I was 'kicking' —— out of one of my classes, and when I woke up this morning I found that I had a very sore toe. I must have struck the bedpost."—Indianapolis News.

SONG OF THE CARROT.

Where Is the Poet Who Will Glorify This Neglected Vegetable?

Why does no poet arise to sing the song of the carrot, the hardest worked vegetable in the kingdom? Much is said in favor of the plethoric pumpkin; the gathering of corn is a commonplace theme, but the poor carrot has been neglected—yea, even scorned.

For diversity of use the carrot has pumpkin and corn backed over the garden wall. Men feed carrots to cattle, increasing the dairy output; they feed them to other stock sometimes, improving its temper. A carrot artificially hollowed with a knife makes an elegant Japanese vase. Sufficiently hardened by harsh contact with the world, a carrot may be used for a weapon, either operated like a mallet with a handle or hurled like a Russian bomb.

Carrots are sometimes even used for food by human beings. They are a chief ingredient in vegetable soup. Mixed with butter, they improve its color. They make better pumpkin pie than pumpkins themselves. Served as hubbard squash, they make one wonder why squashes were invented.

The answer to the high cost of living cry is carrots. Johnson had his Boswell. Whom will the carrot have?—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Varieties of Carbon.

The diamond, the graphite of my lead pencil, the plumbago with which I polish the stove, the soot of my chimney and of my lamp are all chemically the same. All are variations of carbon. By analysis the diamond reduces to pure carbon and a little iron. But, given pure carbon and a little iron, can the chemist, by synthesis, produce the diamond? Science says that he can, though the diamonds made in laboratories by the crystallization of carbon are as yet, minute in size and commercially valueless. Nevertheless they are true diamonds, and the process of their formation is in miniature that of old Mother Earth when, with volcanic basin as seething crucible and toppling mountains as pressure force, the magic mystery of crystallization of carbon went on silently and successfully in what are now the diamond beds of Borneo, Brazil, Colombia, California and Kimberley.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Wanted a Treat.

A man may be rough looking and yet have a touch of sentiment about him.

A ragged, ill kept looking man appeared at the door of a woman's home and in a pleading tone asked:

"Have you a piece of cake, lady, to give to a poor man who hasn't had a bite for two days?"

"Cake?" echoed the woman in surprise. "Isn't bread good enough for you?"

"Ordinarily, yes, ma'am. But this is my birthday," explained the tramp.—New York Journal.

It Sometimes Pays.

A New York contractor said, apropos of a poor man who, after taking tremendous risks, had improved his position a little:

"This fellow's case proves to us that it is sometimes better to try the fire than to stay always in the frying pan."—Exchange.

QUEER TYPE OF INDIAN.

A Mexican Tribe With Fair Skins, Blue Eyes and Light Hair.

Does the word Indian convey to you the picture of a person with black hair, black eyes and dark skin? Then change your opinion at once.

In Mexico there are many Indians who possess none of the aforementioned characteristics that are so often associated with the Indian. The Mexican Indians that are not dark are called the Mayas. They have fair skins, blue eyes and light hair. The only Indian characteristics that they possess are their high cheek bones, their wide mouth, slanting forehead and straight, Indian-like hair and shape of nose.

The Mayas inhabit the Sierra Madre mountains in the lower part of Sonora. They differ in many ways from all other tribes of Indians. They are supposed to be the descendants of the crew and passengers of a Swedish vessel wrecked on the Mexican coast long before the birth of Columbus.

Although quite primitive, their morality is high. They cultivate some corn and garden truck in the valleys and are beginning to raise many limes for export. The men are large and well formed, and some of the women are quite handsome. They all retain some traces of their Swedish ancestry, and some are really fair haired and fair skinned. All are fairer than the average Indian.—Buffalo Express.

Wasted Mustard.

It is stated that a member of a firm of famous mustard manufacturers once remarked that it was not the mustard used, but the quantity that is wasted, which makes their trade a successful business. Usually more of this condiment is mixed than will be wanted and, as it soon turns discolored, dries and loses its pungency, the mustard is thrown away. This waste may to a great extent be saved if care is taken to gauge more accurately than is common the quantity of mustard likely to be wanted for a meal. To prevent unsightly discoloration if kept longer, mix with milk. It is always disagreeable to see a mustard pot clogged round the mouth with stale mustard.—New York Mail.

Get a 10-cent box now.

Turn the rascals out—the headache, biliousness, indigestion, the sick, sour stomach and foul gases—turn them out to-night and keep them out with Cascarets.

Millions of men and women take a Cascaret now and then and never know the misery caused by a lazy liver, clogged bowels or an upset stomach.

Don't put in another day of distress. Let Cascarets cleanse your stomach; remove the sour, fermenting food; take the excess bile from your liver and carry out all the constipated waste matter and poison in the bowels. Then you will feel great.

A Cascaret to-night straightens you out by morning. They work while you sleep. A 10-cent box from any drug store means a clear head, sweet stomach and clean, healthy liver and bowel action for months. Children love Cascarets because they never gripe or sicken. Adv.

CHANCE FOR OBJECT LESSON

Bivalves Would Have Little Prospect of Escape If Karl Really Got Started Romancing.

"Talk of opening oysters," said old Hurricane, "why, nothing's easier, if you only know how."

"And how's how?" inquired Starlight.

"Scotch snuff," answered old Hurricane, very sententiously. "Scotch snuff. Bring a little of it ever so near their noses, and they'll sneeze their lids off."

"I know a genius," observed Karl, "who has a better plan. He spreads the bivalves in a circle, seats himself in the center, and begins spinning a yarn. Sometimes it's an adventure in Mexico, sometimes a marvelous stock operation on the exchange.

"As he proceeds, the 'natives' get interested—one by one they gape with astonishment at the tremendous whoppers which are poured forth, and as they gape my friend whips them out, peppers 'em, and swallows them."

"That'll do," said Starlight, with a long sigh. "I wish we had a bushel of the bivalves here now; they'd open easy."

Theory and Practice.

Little Beatrice was taking piano lessons and learning at the same time something of theory. Like many other children, she disliked practicing her finger exercises. One day her mother, who was working in an upstairs room, noticed a sudden lull in the playing. She looked down and saw Beatrice sitting perfectly motionless.

"Beatrice, why don't you practice?" she called down sharply.

"I am practicing, mother," replied the child with perfect self-assurance; "I'm practicing my theory."—New York Evening Post.

Worse Yet.

"He's a frightful bore, youn baron. Here he's been buzzing the whole evening long about Kant and Schopenhauer."

"You have my sympathy. For my part I detest philosophical discussions."

"Philosophical discussions, indeed! Kant and Schopenhauer are the names of the baron's two horses."—New York Evening Post.

SELF DELUSION.
Many People Deceived by Coffee.

We like to defend our indulgencies and habits even though we may be convinced of their actual harmfulness.

A man can convince himself that whiskey is good for him on a cold morning, or beer on a hot summer day —when he wants the whiskey or beer.

It's the same with coffee. Thousands of people suffer headache and nervousness year after year but try to persuade themselves the cause is not coffee—because they like coffee.

"While yet a child I commenced using coffee and continued it," writes a Wis. man, "until I was a regular coffee fiend. I drank it every morning and in consequence had a blinding headache nearly every afternoon.

"My folks thought it was coffee that ailed me, but I liked it and would not admit it was the cause of my trouble, so I stuck to coffee and the headaches stuck to me.

"Finally, the folks stopped buying coffee and brought home some Postum. They made it right (directions on pkg.) and told me to see what difference it would make with my head, and during that first week on Postum my old affliction did not bother me once. From that day to this we have used nothing but Postum in place of coffee —headaches are a thing of the past and the whole family is in fine health."

"Postum looks good, smells good, tastes good, is good, and does good to the whole body."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

State News of General Interest

MANY LAWS BECOME EFFECTIVE JAN. 1

ELEVEN ACTS OF LAST LEGISLATURE NOW BECOME LAWS.

CASHMAN BILLS IMPORTANT

Constitutionality of Distance Tariff Law Must Be Passed Upon by Courts First, However, as Result of Injunction.

St. Paul—Several of the most important bills passed by the last state legislature became laws Jan. 1. They were made effective at this late date either to give time for adjusting business to the new act, or to avoid confusion in administration.

The most important of these new laws, however, will be held up for a time by an injunction. The Cashman distance tariff act was rendered temporarily null and void when three federal judges granted a ruling against its enforcement until April 1. The injunction, granted at the petition of the Great Western railway, followed closely an opinion from the attorney general's office, whose effect was to knock out the plans of St. Paul and Minneapolis for a common railroad terminal.

The New Laws.

The Minnesota Legislation becoming effective Jan. 1, 1914, is as follows:

Cashman distance tariff act, regulating railroad freight rates.

Cashman joint rate law.

Tax classification law, regulating method of assessment.

Locomotive headlight law.

Sleeping-car tax law.

Raise in salary for mayor of Minneapolis, from $5,000 to $6,000.

Raise in salary for Minneapolis aldermen, from $1,200 to $1,500.

"Pure mattress" law.

Uniform warehouse receipt law.

Bendixen 2-cent fare law.

Allowing mileage to town assessors for trips to county seat.

Two Important Laws.

The two Cashman bills are of great importance and far-reaching effect. The distance tariff law, modeled on the Iowa law, prohibits any railroad from charging any more for hauling a commodity a given distance than it does for hauling it a like distance anywhere else on its line in Minnesota. This is intended to produce absolute equality in freight rates, but involves many problems which are yet to be worked out. The railroad commissioners under the act prepared a schedule of maximum rates, effective Jan. 1, and the railroads are directed to put in new tariffs complying with these schedules. Existing joint rates are maintained, pending future action under the joint rate law, which authorizes the commission to prescribe joint rates lower than the sum of local rates, where freight is hauled over more than one line.

Sweeping Assessment Changes.

The new tax classification law supercedes the one which has been in effect ever since Minnesota became a state, requiring all property to be assessed at its full and true value in cash. This law has never been complied with, and the new act is an endeavor to legalize the practice of assessors and fix a workable legal standard.

The new law divides property into four classes and provides that iron ore lands, consisting class 1, shall be assessed at 50 per cent of their actual value. Class 2, to be assessed at 25 per cent of full value, includes all household goods and furniture and wearing apparel. Class 3 includes livestock, poultry, stocks of merchandise, agricultural products, manufacturers' materials and products, all tools and implements, and all unplatted real estate except iron ore property, and is to be assessed at 33 1-3 per cent of its actual value. Class 4, to be assessed at 40 per cent of its true value, includes city real estate and any other property not specifically mentioned in the three first classes.

The locomotive headlight law, passed through the efforts of trainmen's organizations, requires all engines used in railroad traffic except switch engines, to be equipped with headlights of at least 1,500 candle power, measured without the aid of a reflector, which is said to mean use of electric headlights.

The 2-Cent Law.

The Bendixen 2-cent fare law was passed to help the state in the event the 1907 2-cent-fare law should be declared unconstitutional. It requires all railroads whose passenger earnings exceed $1,200 a mile annually to sell tickets at not over 2 cents a mile. This applies to practically all lines of road in Minnesota, and does not change the situation.

The sleeping car tax law fixes a gross earnings tax of 5 per cent on companies operating sleeping cars in Minnesota, an increase from 4 per cent.

The uniform warehouse receipt law is one to expedite the handling of warehouse receipts as collateral, making the Minnesota law on the subject identical with that of other states so as to standardize the methods of handling them.

The "pure mattress" law took effect Jan. 1, and will protect the buyers of mattresses against second-hand materials. It requires every mattress sold to have a label showing materials used in its manufacture, and whether they are new or have been used before.

FARM MEETING PLANS OUT

Seed Improvement League and Southern Development Men to Hold Joint Session.

Mankato.—Plans are being rapidly perfected for the big meeting to be held at Mankato January 20-24, when the Minnesota Seed Improvement association and Southern Minnesota Better Development League hold joint annual meetings and in connection therewith will hold a corn and other field crops exposition.

A program has been arranged that provides for the largest premium list of prizes for exhibits of products, including corn, wheat, oats, rye, barley, field peas, alfalfa and potatoes. The prizes aggregate over $2,000 in value, among which are a tractor engine capable of doing the ordinary work of three teams of horses; a complete cement stave silo valued at $300; farm trucks; cultivators; cream separators and other valuable implements. There will also be large cash prizes for all the various exhibits. The tractor engine is to be given for the best ten ears of corn, while the silo is to be given for the best fifty ears.

A farmers' short course with a full corps of instructors from the State Agricultural College, will be held each forenoon and an afternoon and evening program dealing with topics of practical interest to every resident of southern Minnesota will be carried out. The speakers comprise some of the best known men in the country, including Governor Eberhart, Prof. G. E. Vincent, Dean A. F. Wood, Prof. N. E. Hansen, Brookings, S. D., the alfalfa wizard, G. P. Tawney, Dr. E. Dana Durand, Thos. E. Cashman, Prof. A. D. Wilson, Carlton Babbitt, a farmer who has solved the problem of keeping the young people on the farm, and other speakers of note. There will also be a meeting of all the high school agricultural instructors. The church people of the state are also to have a session at which topics dealing with the social side of country life will be considered. The prospects are that the largest attendance at any gathering held in the southern part of the state will be present.

FARM CONFERENCE IS HELD

Fifty Delegates Listen to Lectures on Modern Methods at the College of Agriculture.

St. Paul.—With one exception, all of the twenty-five demonstration farms of the college of agriculture were represented at the demonstration farm conference at the university farm. Fifty delegates were in attendance.

Dean A. F. Woods made the address of welcome and outlined the purpose of the conference.

Prof. A. D. Wilson talked on farm management, emphasizing the importance of good, tested seed and the value of organic matter in the soil.

Miss M. C. Danell of the home economics department of the college explained the demonstration farm home and recommended the installation of devices that will decrease the work of the housewife.

The lectures were illustrated with stereopticon slides. The meeting closed Wednesday evening.

Chisholm Boys Are Held.

Chisholm.—Archie and Arthur Trudel and George Gilchrist, boys, were arrested for stealing brass goods, including valves, cocks, couplings, piping and car wheel brasses from the Euclid mine. It is said they have been selling the goods to H. Popkin, a second-hand dealer. Archie Trudel has been employed by the Euclid Mine company to watch the abandoned mine.

Christian Endeavor at Mankato.

Mankato.—The Mankato District Christian Endeavor association held a convention in this city with about thirty-five delegates present. New Ulm, Garden City, Waseca, Le Sueur, Kasota, Mapleton, Winnebago, St. Peter, Ottawa, Cleveland and Medo were represented. The state officers were also present. The purpose of the meeting was to instruct the county and society officers in their duties, and the afternoon was taken up with this work

Join Development Meeting.

St. Paul.—The officers of the Northern, Southern and West Central Development Associations will hold a meeting at noon, January 14, at the Frederick hotel, for the purpose of taking up the matter of a federation of their associations. It is expected that a tentative organization will be formed to consist of the officers of each organization, whose purpose it will be to further all development questions of statewide importance.

IRON FOUND NEAR AITKIN

Late Discoveries Regarded of Great Importance in Ore Districts.

Aitkin.—That recent explorations for iron ore have brought the field nearer to Aitkin is demonstrated by a good strike six miles north of this village.

Drills of the Olson & Berg Development company working under the direction of M. P. Botsford, mining engineer, have been operating on Section 23, Township 48, Range 27, on property owned by George S. Carson of Iowa City, Iowa, and the first hole put down penetrated manganese ore of high grade. The drills are now on the fourth hole, and it is reported that three of these showed manganese ore, some of the five-foot samples taken out going over 31 per cent manganese. The other hole showed a low-grade ore.

The finding of this ore establishes the fact that a continuation of the Cuyuna range lies north of the Mississippi, refuting the contentions of the early explorers that the range does not cross the river. This extension is a continuation of the north part of what is known as the north range, which includes the Cuyuna-Mille Lacs mine in the Crosby district, the texture of the ore found on the Carson place presenting the same characteristics as that taken from the Cuyuna-Mille Lacs mine. The south part of the north range produces bessemer and non-bessemer ore.

WELLS PHYSICIAN IS KILLED

Two Others Hurt, One Fatally, When Automobile Turns Turtle.

Wells.—Dr. Ralph J. McBroom was instantly killed, Earl Babcock fatally injured and Charles Boetcher suffered several broken ribs in an automobile accident.

The men were returning from Walters, Minn., in Dr. McBroom's car. The machine skidded in the snow, ran off the road and crashed through a barb wire fence, after which it turned turtle.

Dr. McBroom was caught beneath the tonneau and instantly killed. Babcock's back was injured so badly that he cannot recover.

In spite of his broken ribs, Boetcher dragged himself to a farmer's house and got assistance. With Babcock he was placed in a hospital here.

All of the victims were prominent residents of Wells. McBroom and Babcock were unmarried.

LAKE CITY PIONEER DIES

On Same Farm Nearly 60 Years. Charles Gould Settled in Home District in 1855.

Lake City.—Charles Gould, aged 89 years, a resident of this section since 1855, is dead at his home near this city. He was born in Walpole, Mass., in 1824, and was among the "forty-niners" going to California, where he remained three years.

Coming to the township of Central Point, adjoining Lake City, in 1855, he settled on a claim and has lived on the same farm nearly sixty years. He was married to Betsy Starbird at Boston on June 22, 1847, and they celebrated their sixty-fourth wedding anniversary in 1911. Mrs. Gould died Jan. 8, 1912. He is survived by two sons, Charles A. of Lac qui Parle, and E. W. of Minneapolis, and two daughters, Mrs. E. W. Rossmann of Chatfield and Miss Rosa Gould, who is at home. The funeral will take place Wednesday.

Owatonna Show a Success.

Owatonna.—The exhibit of Owatonna-made goods at the armory was even a bigger success than was anticipated. The number of visitors who looked over the displays of firms occupying booths in the big building augurs well for tomorrow's attendance. The exhibits were generally attractive and among the foremost are those of the King Ventilating company, the Minnetonna Manufacturing company, the L. G. Campbell Milling company and the Owatonna Manufacturing company. A banquet was tendered by the manufacturers' association Saturday evening.

Minister Gets License Revoked.

Mankato.—After an exciting session of the city council acting as judge and jury at a hearing on the question of revoking the licenses of three saloonkeepers, the license of John C. Hagen was revoked, and motions to revoke the other two were defeated. The complaint was made by the ministerial association, which joined forces with the Salvation Army, basing it on the fact that the saloonkeepers had been convicted of violating the liquor laws.

Deep Snow at Duluth.

Duluth. — The rather light snowfall that greeted homeward bound revelers New Year's morning continued throughout the day, growing in intensity and before the storm ceased a nine-inch blanket covered the head of the lakes and the iron range territory. It was the first real snowfall of the season. Railway and interurban traffic was impeded to some extent, according to reports from the various towns, although the precipitation was heaviest at Duluth and Superior.

THREE WAYS FOR USING RYE

Makes Valuable Fertilizer on Any Kind of Land, But More Especially on Stiff, Clay Soils.

(By E. J. MILLER.)

Rye which is sown in the fall for green feed during cold weather may be economically used in at least three ways the next spring and the early summer. One of these ways is to use it for pasture. Another way is to use it for a summer soiling crop for milk cows.

An acre or two on rich land, will produce a large amount of early green feed, and the crop can be used for nearly three months.

To use rye as a soiling crop, keep the stock off it in the spring; and when it is tall enough to cut, take the mower to the patch and cut enough for two days' feeding. Rake this and store in the barn and feed out. Then mow enough more for another two days' feeding and continue the same method until the patch is all mown.

By this time the rye of the first mowing will have grown up enough for a second cutting, and in succession it may be cut several times during the early spring and summer. In this way a great number of cows may be kept on a limited area of pasture.

And a third and excellent way to use rye the following spring, after sowing is to allow it to grow up almost to maturity and plow the entire crop under as green manure. For this purpose allow it to head out and seed come into the milk stage.

It is a valuable fertilizer on any kind of land, and especially valuable on stiff, clay soil, and making the soil friable and easy to work.

The mature rye plant decomposes quickly when plowed under, and gives no ill effects from souring.

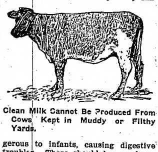
The humus content of the soil is appreciably increased, and the general good effect on the soil can be noticed on succeeding crops for two or three years.

KEEP THE DAIRY COW CLEAN

Problem of Sanitary Milk Supply Is to Exclude All Bacteria Possible—Some Precautions.

Milk from healthy cows is practically free from bacteria when secreted. The problem of a sanitary milk supply, therefore, is to keep out all bacteria as far as possible. Bacteria are introduced into milk mainly by small particles of dirt which either drop into the milk from the cow or are carried in the air.

Repeated tests have shown that even when a cow is cleaned as thoroughly as is possible under stable conditions, particles of dust will be thrown off from her body during milking time, and these get into the milk and contaminate it. Cows should be kept away from sources of contamination, such as sink holes in which stagnant water accumulates, for such holes breed enormous numbers of putrefactive bacteria which are especially dangerous to infants, causing digestive troubles. There should be no places in the barn yard for water to stagnate. The manure should be kept gathered up, and every other effort made to keep the cow free from contamination.



Clean Milk Cannot Be Produced From Cows Kept in Muddy or Filthy Yards.

The cow should be thoroughly cleaned, preferably immediately before milking. It is also well to clip the hair short around the flanks and udder, and always advisable to moisten the flanks just before milking. All of these precautions tend to lessen the amount of dust or loose hair which will be given off from the cow.

FENCES SAVE MUCH PASTURE

In Many Cases Fencing of Field Will Pay for Woven Wire Used—Good Aid to Prosperity.

(By E. J. MILLER.)

Fencing and moving of fences should be done early, so that all of the spare fields can be grazed over to make use of the grasses and other herbage that have grown up in them after the early fall rains.

Much feed can be saved in this way, the stock will do better and it will give the permanent pastures time to green up before the cold weather. New and clean pastures mean healthier animals, and the utilizing of all the fence rows means turning waste products into dollars.

In many cases the fencing of a field this fall for new pastures will entirely pay for the woven-wire fencing used. Buy and use good fencing for all the field. Good fencing is an aid to prosperity.

Inviting Inducements.

To the man with a clear-cut vonviction of just what he wants and who has the necessary ability and courage to stay with it until it is accomplished the field of breeding dairy cattle offers inviting inducements.

Wise Economy.

It is wise economy to plant windbreaks of evergreens, arbor vitae, Norway spruce and balsam fir, a portion of each with a sprinkling of other varieties to make a pleasing contrast.

ECZEMA BURNED AND ITCHED

203 Walnut St., Hillsboro, Ill.—"My child had a breaking out on the lower limbs which developed into eczema. The eczema began with pimples which contained yellow corruption and from the child's clothing they were greatly irritated. They seemed to burn, which made the child scratch them, resulting in a mass of open places. They made her so cross and fretful that it was impossible to keep her quiet. They caused her to lose much sleep and she was constantly tormented by severe itching and burning.

"I tried several well-known remedies, but got no relief until I got a sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment, which did so much good that I got a large quantity that cured her in ten days after she had been affected for two months." (Signed) Mrs. Edith Schwartz, Feb. 28, 1913.

Magnificent Crops in all Western Canada

All parts of the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have produced wonderful yields of Wheat, Oats, Barley and Flax. Wheat graded from Contract to No. 1 Hard, weighed heavy and yielded from 20 to 45 bushels per acre; 22 bushels was about the total average. Mixed Farming may be considered fully as profitable an industry as grain raising. The excellent grasses full of nutrition, are the only food required either for beef or dairy purposes. In 1912, and again in 1913, at Chicago, Manitoba carried off the Championship for beef steer. Good schools, markets convenient, climate excellent. For the homesteader, the man who wishes to farm extensively, or the investor, Canada offers the biggest opportunity of any place on the continent.

Was It Force of Habit.

An amused smile fluttered over the features of Congressman Samuel J. Tribble of Georgia the other night when the talk topic in the lobby of a Washington hotel turned to the wonderful sayings of the kiddies. He said he was reminded of a recent incident.

A fond father was taking his little six-year-old daughter to town in a motor car, and on stopping in front of a store he noticed that the drive against the strong wind had made the youngster's eyes water.

"Just a minute, Jessie," said father, wrapping a corner of his handkerchief around one finger and dabbing the little girl's eye. "Let me wipe that tear away."

"Say," was the rather amazing exclamation of Jessie, "what do you think that is—a push button?"

GOOD VEGETABLE SEED

Major Portion of American-Grown Comes From California.

Seedsmen and Professional Growers Are Learning That Wisdom and Care in Breeding and Growing Are of Much Importance.

It is practically impossible to give an accurate statement of the area in the United States which is annually devoted to raising garden seeds, or even to make a reliable estimate of the total acreage. Even on farms where the chief money crop is garden seed, only a portion (often but a small portion) of the whole farm is in a seed crop any single year, the remainder being occupied with ordinary farm crops in order to maintain a profitable crop rotation. The major portion of American-grown small seeds, like those of onion and lettuce, is the product of large farms located in California, though many thousands of pounds of such seeds are grown in the eastern states. One who is very familiar with seed growing on the Pacific coast estimates that the total acreage of vegetable seed annually planted in California is not far from 10,000 acres.

Vine crops, such as cucumbers, melons, and squashes, are grown for the seed crop in all parts of the United States, some of which are grown in the northwestern states and others in Florida, with still others in California; but the great bulk of the supply of vine seeds comes from Michigan and the central western states. Probably a total of 60,000 to 80,000 acres of vine crops is annually planted with the expectation that more or less of the crop will be marketed as seed.

Fifty years ago there was little general appreciation, even among experienced gardeners, of the importance of the quality of the seed used (provided it would only grow) as a factor in determining the real profit in growing a crop.

It is evident that the present practice of growing and handling seeds is by no means ideal or such as to give the greatest possible uniformity of varietal character. In the case of a majority of the vegetable cultures in America, if all of even 90 per cent. of the plants were as nearly alike in varietal type as the 20 per cent. which were the most alike, the profit from these cultures would be greatly increased; often actually doubled. On the other hand, the growing of vegetable seed under present conditions is not particularly profitable or satisfactory to the farmer. Is there any possibility of betterment? We think so.

Seed planters are coming to realize more fully the importance of the use of better seed and the folly of being so largely influenced by low prices and a persuasive salesman in buying, while seedsmen and professional growers are learning that wisdom and care in the breeding and growing of the seeds they offer is quite as important as shrewdness in buying and skillful handling and selling, and that seeds of the best quality cannot be secured without the active, intelligent co-operation of the producing farmer.

STEM RUSTS OF PINE TREES

Unsightly Fungus Growth Found on Many Trees in Northeastern Section—No Great Damage Done.

An unsightly fungus growth which ruins the appearance of the tree, has been found on many of the pine trees in the northeastern section of the country within the past year or so. So far this fungus has not done any great amount of damage, but every precaution should be taken to prevent its spread. All infected pines should be destroyed or the infected branches cut off. Most of the pines having this fungus on their main trunk are of little value. When the infection takes place in the seedlings it is much more injurious than when the older trees become infected.

Value of Education.

The question is often asked, "Of how much value is school training to farmers from a business standpoint?" A recent agricultural survey of several townships of Tompkins county, New York, made by the college of agriculture of Cornell university has revealed many interesting and suggestive facts bearing upon rural sociology. To quote from the summary:

"The survey shows that a high school education is worth as much to a farmer as $6,000 worth of five per cent. bonds. A college education is worth nearly twice as much."

The Treasure of Spandau

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

"War," said Nikolai to me, "is the greatest of all knaveries. It is made possible only by the tribute that the strong have exacted from the weak. So, by relieving the German government of its funds, I shall be assisting the cause of humanity."

We were in Berlin. The Morocco affair had stirred all Europe, and war between the Teuton and the Gaul was believed to be imminent. All Berlin was aflame with enthusiasm. Nikolai, passing a patriotic procession, laughed scornfully.

"And this the folly of these silly sheep of which the government hopes to reap the advantage by an unpardonable attack on France," he said. "It would be a charity to prevent it."

"Prevent war?" I exclaimed.

Nikolai turned to me. "What makes war possible?" he asked.

"Money," I answered promptly.

"And the German government's war fund is—"

"In the fortress of Spandau," I exclaimed, suddenly enlightened.

Everybody knows that after France had paid Germany a huge monetary indemnity in 1871, the Teutonic government set aside a war fund of several million pounds in gold, which was immured in the recesses of the fortress of Spandau, nine miles from Berlin. And it was this sum that Nikolai contemplated raiding.

I confess the audacity of the scheme staggered me. Even knowing Nikolai as I did, the idea appeared to me incredible. Yet here was this one man calmly proposing to loot the treasures of the kaiser, and those buried in the recesses of one of Germany's most powerful fortresses.

The evening papers were full of war news. Among other items we gleaned that the guns of Spandau were about to be dismounted and sent to the frontier, to help overawe the French government. It was the policy of Germany to obtain her ends peacefully if possible. In consequences, the publication of these items, as calculated to terrorize France, was rather encouraged. The papers teemed with stories of the preparations for mobilization.

Among other things we read that a cargo of shrapnel shells was to be hurled to Spandau, and thence to be conveyed with the guns to a waste territory in Alsace, used by the government for war manoeuvres on a large scale. Extensive firing practice, we learned, was to be carried on there, and, if the French government did not then come to terms, the mimic war would be converted into a reality.

Nikolai was morose on the following day. I think the magnitude of his scheme was now better realized by him. Together we haunted the vicinity of the freight yards.

"Those shells will arrive from the Krupp factories," he mediated. "Summers, it will be our task to convey them to Spandau in person."

"But how?" I asked.

Nikolai smiled. "In a bureaucracy," he answered, "everything is possible." And he made an appointment to meet me at the freight yards at seven o'clock that evening.

That was the hour at which the special train, bearing the load of shells, was due to arrive. Everything goes by clockwork in Germany, and punctually at seven o'clock the train entered the station, the great shells openly displayed in the cars. Upon the engine was a representative of the Krupp works.

Disguised as a mechanic, I waited, terrified lest at any moment some of the officers should inquire my business. But they were too much absorbed with the affairs in hand. A tall officer in uniform, wearing crossed swords upon his shoulders, stepped forward among those waiting and displayed an order. I gasped; it was Nikolai himself.

He beckoned me and said, with assumed roughness:

"I want you, my man, to help unload this cargo at its destination." Then, turning to the officers assembled, he added:

"You see, gentlemen, it is the emperor's special order. These shells must be run in to Spandau this evening or I cannot answer for the consequences."

They did not scrutinize the paper hard. They saw the signature of the kaiser and saluted. Then, turning to the station agent, Nikolai commanded that the train be shunted to the private line, which runs direct to the fortress.

Half an hour later the train was in motion. Nikolai and I rode upon the engine, our solitary companion being the driver, whose duty would be completed when he had taken the train to its destination. A brief run brought us within sight of the frowning fortress, a bastion strong enough to have defied centuries of time and all the artillery of any hostile army. Yet Nikolai had set himself to capture its treasures!

The train ran right within the walls and halted in a wide square inside, around which the great black hulks of the guns loomed like some prehistoric monsters. Soldiers were passing busily to and fro; none of them, however, paid any attention to us. They had their orders, and in Germany meddling with external affairs is discouraged. Nikolai stepped off and proceeded toward a little archway which led to the quarters of the commanding officer. Presently the two emerged together.

"Your Excellency," said Nikolai, "I have now fulfilled the emperor's instructions. You yourself, doubtless, have received orders as to the disposition of these shells. I shall proceed to unload them, with the help of your men, and my machanic here will examine each shell separately for any possible defects sustained in transit. He is the chief foreman of the ordnance branch of the Krupp factory."

The commanding offier acquiesced, and when, at his command, which was issued through several subordinates, files of soldiers in fatigue dress came swarming in the center of the square, indicated that the shells were to be unloaded. The men fell to with a will. Each shell was an enormous burden for a single soldier, and soon the sweat was streaming down their faces. It was midnight before the last of the ammunition was safely stacked in the square.

Nikolai produced a small hammer from the pocket of his overcoat and handed it to me. "Tap the shells lightly," he whispered. "Some are defective—you understand? You are acquainted with their mechanism?"

I had not served to no purpose in the British Royal artillery. I plied my task, calling to Nikolai frequently. The soldier had withdrawn; the commanding officer, who stood watching us, showed signs of fatigue. After half an hour, while his yawns grew visibly longer, Nikolai spoke.

"Your excellency," he said, "I regret to say that my mechanic here finds quite a number of defective time-fuses. To remedy this work will require several hours of hard work."

The commanding officer came over. He looked at the shells. "I see nothing wrong with them," he said, peering through his glasses.

"Perhaps not, sir," Nikolai rejoined, "and I have no doubt that in a pinch all would prove serviceable. Nevertheless, the Krupp factory feels a peculiar responsibility in this matter, and, with your leave, this fellow shall adjust the defective ones."

"As you please," replied the commanding officer shortly. "Captain Kuppenheim will superintend the matter." He turned toward his office to give the order. Nikolai, beckoning me, followed him.

The office was a small, well-furnished room connecting with the officer's quarters by a small psasage-way, which cut it off from the rest of the house. He turned to his desk. Nikolai was close upon his heels. In an ante-room I saw an orderly dozing over a fire. Upon the desk was a bell. The officer bent over to press it.

And suddenly Nikolai's arms were round his throat, one hand pressed upon his mouth. The officer struggled valiantly, but he was perfectly helpless in Nikolai's grasp. Instantly I had improvised a gag and thrust it into his mouth; then, with lengths of cord which lay scattered around the apartment, we bound his limbs and trussed him like a fowl. We rolled him into a corner, where he lay glaring at us in an indescribably comical manner, utterly helpless. I looked into the ante-room. The orderly was snoring peacefully.

"That was the crux of the problem," said Nikoli. "Now all is plain sailing. It's lucky we found that cord."

The office was in confusion. Piles of papers and wrappings lay all about. In one corner was a screen. Nikolai placed it in front of the officer and motioned to me to step behind it.

"Hold your revolver to his head," he said. "The slightest sound or drumming of limbs and he dies." He said this in a tone loud enough to be perfectly understood by the helpless officer.

But then we were a little uncertain. It seemed incredible that we could remain there long undiscovered. Nikolai called the orderly.

"Go to bed," he said. "We do not need you."

I had expected that the soldier would question this command from a stranger, but the German soldier is trained to implicit obedience to the word of a superior. He simply saluted and marched stiffly out of the door. Then, at Nikolai's word, I raised the officer, and together we carried him into the ante-room, where we deposited him upon the hearth before the fire, with a pillow beneath his head.

All this while my thoughts had been running on the gold. But Nikolai was not yet ready. He had told me to make doubly sure that his plans would not miscarry. He called after the retreating orderly. The man turned.

"Send Captain Kuppenheim here," he said.

Two minutes later the captain came running in, drew himself up and saluted.

"Captain Kuppenheim," said Nikolai, returning the salute, "I have the honor to inform you that you will receive your orders from me." And he showed him a paper—Heaven knows how many of them Nikolai had forged, or how he had done so—bearing the superscription of the kaiser. The captain looked at it and saluted again.

"You will tell off a half company of men to keep guard in the courtyard," said Nikolai, "while the shells are adjusted. They will be ready in half an hour and will form in columns of four, in fatigue uniform."

The captain saluted aagin. "That will do, Captain Kuppenheim," said Nikolai.

The captain retired stiffly. Then Nikolai turned to me. "We must find the keys," he whispered.

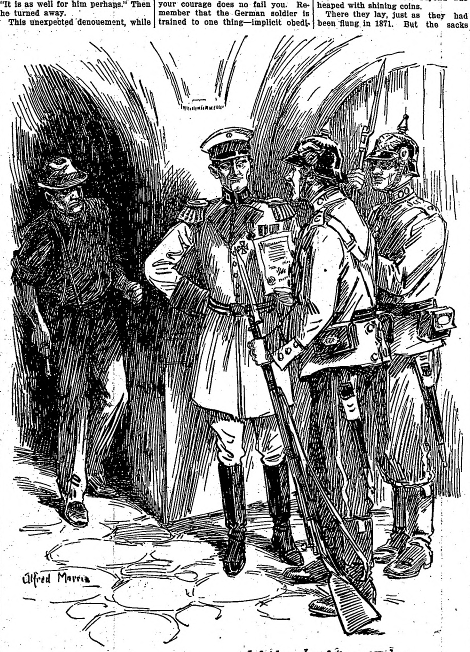
"Let us take another look at the general," I exclaimed. In truth, though he had been bound hand and foot, though he could make no outcry, I was astonished that he had not somehow managed to indicate his presence in some manner. It is difficulty to deprive a man entirely of motion, be his bonds ever so strong.

We went into the ante-room. The general lay by the hearth just as we had placed him. Nikolai lifted his arm. It fell heavily. By the light of the fire I scrutinized his face. The eyes were half open, but there was no recognition in them.

"He is dead," said Nikolai, solemnly.

It was true. He was an old man, and the shock had, doubtless, brought about a fatal stroke of apoplexy. Nikolai gazed at him a moment in silence. Then he raised his hand at the salute.

"Honor to a brave man, even though he be a servant of tyranny," he said. "It is as well for him perhaps." Then he turned away.



I laid my hand to my revolver.

This unexpected denouement, while it could not add to the desperate condition of our undertaking, solved one of our most pressing difficulties. All danger from this source was now removed. Nikolai went back into the office, and together we searched for the keys. And we found them. We found bunches of keys—keys of every kind. There must have been half a hundred when we gave up the search. But which was the key to the strong room?

"None of these," said Nikolai. "It will be in triplicate—and there will be a combination." He paused and looked at me sadly. "Summers," he said, "I had hoped to wring the secret from the dead man by threat of death. It was a desperate hope at best; now it is not even a hope. The secret of the combination was known to none but him, doubtless.

Suddenly I had an inspiration.

"The key will be upon his person!" I exclaimed.

Nikolai's hand descended softly upo my shoulder. "You are right, Summers," he said. "Come!"

It was repugnant to me to lay hands upon the dead man there by the fire. I felt guilty as a parricide as I reverently cut the bonds; as a robber of the dead when I turned out the contents of the pockets. There were letters there in feminine writing, money, papers, a hasty glimpse at which revealed their unimportance to us, and a great gleaming golden watch which, as I took it, opened in my hand and flashed out the time to me. But there was no key.

"Round his neck," said Nikolai.

And there we found it. It was a little golden key, alone, but of a peculiar fashion. I saw at once that, by pressing a spring upon its handle, it was convertible into either of two other kinds through an automatic movement of the wards. There were, then, three locks to be forced.

I felt elated; I could hardly restrain my joy. But Nikolai stood looking down at me gravely.

"That's no use, Summers," he said. "We need the combination."

I had forgotten that. Our partial success had only made our eventual failure the more humiliating. Still, we had found the key. Perhaps the combination might be written down. "He was an old man," I said. "His memory might have been faulty. Would he have kept three sets of figures in his brain?"

And, even as the wards left my lips, a coal popped in the fire, and a bright blaze sprang up and flickered on the gold watch. And on the edge of the inner case, by some miracle of observation I saw three rows of figures minutely scratched.

"The combination!" I exclaimed.

There was little doubt. According to the German system, the lock was set by numbers instead of letters, and these could mean nothing else.

We stood there in exultation for a moment, until a noise without recalled us to ourselves. The soldiers were filing in the yard. Outside I could see Captain Kuppenheim and a sergeant marshaling them.

"Summers," said Nikolai, "our task is now an extremely simple one if your courage does no fail you. Remember that the German soldier is trained to one thing—implicit obedience. The most singular action will not be observed by him. He is trained as an automaton, nothing more.

"Our duty now is to procure the gold. I know the location of the strong room. We cannot hope to carry even a tenth part away; I trust, however, that we shall ultimately reap a rich reward from our enterprise. Follow me!"

We passed out boldly into the courtyard, Nikopai gravely returning the salute of the officer. He led me through a second archway, along a low passage which terminated in a barred door. Two sentries on duty stood at attention. Nikolai fitted the gold key to the lock. A moment's fumbling, and it opened, and we passed through. Looking back, I saw that the sentries were still at attention.

The passage now turned off to the right abruptly, and a second door faced us. This was unguarded. It opened noiselessly, and we found ourselves in a huge, vaulted chamber of gloomy aspect, at the end of which a fire was burning. Two soldiers in uniform rose and saluted us. Nikolai passed between them and fitted the key to the door. One of the men detained him.

"Pardon, excellency," he said. "None but his excellency, General Faber, enters this chamber."

"Read that!" said Nikolai sharply, whipping out a paper. Again I saw the emperor's signature. I afteward learned that one paper had served on each of the three occasions.

"Well, can't you read?" snapped Nikolai, as the soldier still barred the way.

"No, excellency," replied the man humbly.

"Fool! Do you know your emperor's signature?"

"No, excellency," the soldier answered humbly. "No one but General Faber passes through this door. Those are his orders."

As Nikolai still made toward the door there came a clatter of steel, and simultaneously the two guards had snatched up their rifles and fitted bayonets to them. I laid my hand on my revolver; then I saw that Nikolai was still expostulating with the men.

"What are your exact orders, dolts?" he asked. And then the men replied in chorus:

"It is forbidden that anyone except his excellency, General Faber, passes through this door."

"Well said," cried Nikolai heartily, clapping the nearest man upon the back. "I was but testing you. I shall report your good conduct to our emperor himself." The soldiers presented bayonets at the name. "And now, my men," he continued, handing the key to one of the guard, "do you take this and turn the lock until you see the number 975 appear—see, I will show you. Now turn it and enter."

The soldier took the key and opened the door obediently. As it swung back a blaze of electric light flooded the chamber. And I staggered back in astonishment. I saw astonishment upon Nikolai's face, astonishment upon the stolid countenances of the guards. For the vault beyond was heaped with shining coins.

There they lay, just as they had been flung in 1871. But the sacks which had contained them had mouldered under the touch of time, and the floor was heaped ceiling high with gold pieces. They lay like flakes of golden grain, shining and scintillating in the electric glow.

"Enter, men, and gather 2,000 pieces," said Nikolai. And the men obeyed him and, staggered toward him, carrying the coins in pieces of rotting sackcloth.

"Close the door and remain on guard," said Nikolai. With our pockets filled and also bearing a precious cargo in our arms, we staggered out. At the second door, however, Nikolai halted.

"An officer may not carry a bundle," he said. "Summers, I must transfer this freight to you. Can you carry it?"

It was the heaviest burden I had caried in my life. I staggered through the passage, Nikolai beside me. At the outermost door he whispered his final instructions.

"Dump them in the freight cars," he whispered. "In the first car are tools. Unscrew the shells, pour out the shrapnel, and fill them. You understand? I shall be with you."

We passed out of the courtyard. The soldiers stood in columns of four, but at a word from Nikolai, they withdrew and formed a hollow square at some distance from the cars. The night was moonless; our operations were hardly visible.

When I had deposited my burden in the car, Nikolai and I went back for more. Twenty times we made that journey, and every time, the soldiers brought out the coins to us. And, at the twenty-first we had made scarcely an impression upon the shining hoard. Reluctantly Nikolai gave the final order to close the door.

Then all through the night I toiled, filling the shells. I lifted them into the cars one by one, unscrewed the projectiles, filled them with coins, and poured out the shrapnel, until, in place of the golden flood that lapped my feet there was a stream of leaden bullets. It was dawn before my task was done.

It was done at last. The shells were screwed fast; in the breaking light Nikolai and I looked into each other's haggard faces. And we read in each other's eyes that we had miserably failed.

For neither of us had estimated in any degree the magnitude of our task. We had not known how very few gold pieces prove the limit of a man's strength. We had removed 40,000 pieces of gold, worth roughly $200,000—200,000, when there remained 10,000,000 pieces behind!

With bleeding hands I descended from the cars. Nikolai called to the driver, who was dozing upon his engine. The cars were uncoupled. It seemed hours before we got up steam, while the day lighted, and I waited in an agony of apprehension. At last the engine was in readiness to move. We sprang aboard, the wheels revolved, and as the sun rose we passed through the fortress gates into the open country beyond. We had plundered Spandau; but where was our gain?

"That," said Nikolai, "remains for future gathering. When the shells burst upon the practice field in Alsace there will be good gold pieces sown among the weeds for our picking up." And so he began to laugh.

It was a scheme hatched in the most fantastic brain that ever a sane man possessed. We had filled the shells with gold, that we might pick up the contents after the big guns had fired at the practice targets on the waste ground! But the war scare blew over, and Spardau's guns were never moved. Doubtless our gold-filled shells still repose in the arsenal at Spardau.

LEARNED WANTS OF PEOPLE

Englishman Set Himself to Supply Them, and Now Is Many Times a Millionaire.

In the Strand Sir Joseph Lyons, the biggest caterer in England—perhaps in the world—tells the story of how he first conceived the idea of "feeding the masses." It chanced, he says, that, to satisfy the inner man, one morning in the '80s I strolled into a dirty—to me, repellent—little London restaurant. These unappetizing establishments were almost invariably small, being limited in the capacities for cooking and serving of the man and his wife, with, perhaps, one or two waiters. They were so often invariably dark, stuffy little places, often infested with cockroaches; and as for their kitchens, they were things liable to cause nightmares—anyway, I prefer not to tell of them. The city clerk who wanted a snack had to pay eight cents for a cup of coffee or tea, a two-cent tip, and two or four cents for a bun. It goes without saying that these charges were beyond their slender means; result, he adjourned to the nearest bar and had a glass of beer.

Well, on the occasion to which I refer I entered the said "restaurant," ordered the least uninviting dish I could hit upon, and turned things over in my mind during the unconscionably long time I had to wait for the arrival of my repast. I had often enough before this reflected how great fortunes had been made by the discovery of some simple universal want waiting to be supplied. In a flash it came to me that I had discovered just such a simple, unsupplied universal want—clean and decent fare in bright and congenial surroundings at a reasonable price.

And there and then was laid the foundation stone of a business which now feeds about 2,000,000 of the inhabitants of London, and which on every working day in the year caters for over 500,000 men, women and children—a business, too, which finds work for nearly 16,000 employes, which possesses 250 branches (the number is steadily increasing, both in London and the provinces), and which has no fewer than 120,000 agents throughout the country selling our "wares." Yes, in a small way—and I write it with due humility—a chance visit of a discontented artist to a dirty restaurant has exercised a considerable influence, indeed, over the lives of a very large section of men, women and children in Great Britain.

For Health, a Walk.

In the warm weather, when exercise in the heat of the day seems a burden, try walking early in the morning and again late in the evening.

Be energetic and get up before breakfast in earnest. Don't try to walk before you have eaten, but eat something light and satisfying and start forth on a morning constitutional. You can get home again before the heat of the day has really set in.

If you find the morning walk impossible, try the evening walk. Start out after the sun has gone down, either before a late dinner or after an early one, and walk in the dusk until you are tired.

The woman who must work in office or shop would find systematic early morning and late evening exercise beneficial and invigorating.

Diverse Impressions.

"My new gown," said Mrs. Flimgilt, "is a dream."

"It may be a dream for you," replied her husband; "but it's insomnia for me."

NEWS and GOSSIP of WASHINGTON

His Oratory Is Loud Though State Is Little

WASHINGTON.—It is not often that the little state of Delaware is heard from in the house of representatives, but when she does arise to address the chair she bellows like a bull. It was worth while listening to Representative Brockson of that state when he took considerably more than an hour in his effort to divest the house of the opinion that the whipping posts of Delaware are inhuman, brutal, unconstitutional, and relics of a medieval age when pillories and alleged witchcraft walked hand in hand.

Mr. Brockson received great applause for his oratory, which is just as loud as that of Representative Sisson, who comes from a much larger state, Mississippi; and the applause was not limited to the members of the house. Over in the southwest corner of the gallery sat a man who applauded with his two hands just as loud as any of members. In fact, when Mr. Brockson made a particularly strong point this well-wisher clapped his palms so vigorously that a doorkeeper had to admonish him that applause in the galleries is not allowed. In the midst of a hot debate one of the numerous Smiths of congress arose.

"According to the gentlemen's statement," he said, "there are six cases pending in Delaware. If that is a fact does it not indicate that corporal punishment has not stopped these brutal crimes? In a little state like Delaware you have six cases at the present moment in which whipping is to be administered."

The house was all ears.

"What state is the gentleman from?" asked Delaware's sole representative.

"New York," replied Representative Smith, and the contrast between the two states made the house laugh with great glee.

However, Representative Brockson came right back at him. He told Buffalo Smith that the last time four New York crooks came to Delaware they were given the whipping-post treatment—and never came back.

The controversy reminded some of the older members of an almost forgotten incident where a Delaware representative assailed the state of Texas. He ranted for about an hour. Then a Texan, with a long mustache, arose:

"It gives me great pain," he said, "to hear my vast state assailed by a gentleman from a state which has one county when the tide is up—and one and a half counties when the tide is down."

Didn't Know Hearst, but Was Glad to Meet Him

SAY, OLD TIMER, GET ME A MATCH

PARKER ANDERSON of North Carolina mingles with the great of the nation with exactly the same nonchalance as he uses in lighting a cigar. Parker knows cabinet officers by their first names, and the "Keep out" sign is always automatically reversed to "Welcome" when Parker strolls into the office of a senator or representative. It was only a few days ago that he paid a call upon Commissioner of Internal Revenue Osborn. The office was crowded with folks, big and little, important and unimportant, job hunters and patronage grabbers, and a clerk was keeping them all back in line until the commissioner had signed his mail.

"I would like to see my friend Osborn right away," announced Anderson in a smooth voice.

"No one gets in that door ahead of me!" announced a shrill female who would have been at home brandishing a war ax. "I got here first."

"Pardon me, madam," said Anderson, bowing, as an attendant deferentially opened the door for him to pass within——

Well, there are a lot of fellows like that, and a lot of good they can do if they want to. You see, Anderson is a newspaper man. He got into the business from the telegraph end.

They tell a story of him in his telegraph days, which may throw some light on the way the great men of the nation ask him to set down and listen to stories. Once, when he was an operator here in Washington, some fellow made an attack upon William Randolph Hearst. It was a violent effort, and Mr. Hearst became extremely interested. He happened to be here in the city, and the New York American bureau was instructed by him to gt a telegraphic story of the speech which was being made, and then Mr. Hearst was going to wire an editorial to his paper in the town where the fireworks were being shot off.

The telegraph company sent Anderson over to the American bureau to handle the key. His fingers spat lightning for an hour. During that time a long person came out and sat by him. Anderson's cigar went out.

"Say, old timer, get me a match," he said, and he leaned over and slapped the long person a resounding thwack on the leg.

"All right," was the reply, and the lanky one went out and got a box full.

"Hivins," said the janitor. "Don't ye know that's Mister Hearst?"

"No," responded Anderson, still making the key hum; "but I'm glad to meet him."

She Gave the Crowd Something to Snicker At

A WOMAN with a nubia over her foreign black hair and with eyes as fresh as spring water gave a crowd something to snicker at the other afternoon. She was brisking along Seventh street when she stopped with a shocked suddenness to look in her brown cord bag. Something must have gone wrong with her finances, for the inventory brought to the spring water eyes that distracted look that comes from trying to think up where the money went.

She repeated the rummage act, without relief. Then—and here's where the free show came in.

She plumped herself down on the curbstone, yanked the bag open and spilled its contents in her lap and unwrapped each package.

She must have been an early Christmas shopper woman, for her layout included a wool knitted clown with brass symbals that strike when you pull a string—maybe, and there was a calico cat and a tiny set of tea things decorated with red flowers that come off at the first washing, you know—and a child's hair ribbon that the clerk had tied into a bow—and there was spool cotton and shoe laces and safety pins and——

The price of each purchase did the woman count up by thumping her fingers on her knee. But her anxiety showed no sign of a let-up until, with a flash of belated memory, she pushed a hand under her jacket and brought out a pin with a glass set that was better than a truly emerald, because it was as big again as any emerald ever dared to be and a whole lot greener.

The obviously missing dime had been tracked to its lair.

OUT-OF-ORDINARY PEOPLE

AUSTRIA'S MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Count Leopold Berchtold, minister of foreign affairs and chancellor of Austria-Hungary, who but yesterday was the best abused man in the dual empire, has become literally overnight an object of the greatest popular enthusiasm and admiration.

It has suddenly been brought home to his countrymen that he is a past master in the art of statecraft and diplomacy, and that they owe him a debt of gratitude for the clever way in which he safeguarded their interests beyond their borders during the last two years.

This revulsion of feeling, so startling in its suddenness, has been brought about, not by any utterance of the count, who remains as reticent and as enigmatical as heretofore, but by the publication in the Matin—most enterprising and affluent of all the great Parisian newspapers—of the terms of the secret treaties uniting the Balkan allies in their coalition against Turkey, and also of their equally secret agreement with Russia in this connection.

AMBASSADOR PAGE FINDS HOME

At last it seems that Ambassador Page has decided upon a residence in Rome. This has not been an easy matter for two reasons. Mrs. Page wished to have a garden, and the most exaggerated rumors had got about in regard to the Pages' wealth.

Hence the sums asked for inferior places were enormous. It is a fixed idea of every Italian that every American is rolling in money and does not mind parting with it. While the former may be true of Mr. Page, he is certainly a man who would not allow himself to be swindled by a landlord.

He has finally decided upon a house that has already been inhabited by two American ambassadors, Henry White and Lloyd Griscom. It is really a princely apartment in the Palazzo del Drago, comprising the whole first floor. The suite has large reception rooms and a long white hall where large formal dinners are given.

The Palazzo del Drago has interesting historical traditions, as the family of del Drago, one of the oldest in Rome, dating back to 1133, is also one of the most aristocratic. It was in the Palazzo del Drago that the daughter of Queen Cristina of Spain lived after her marriage with Prince del Drago. There are many relics of her regime in the apartment Mr. Page has taken, notably some chairs, which are still surmounted with the royal crown.

SAYS TANGO IS SYMPTOM OF DISEASE

"The tango is one symptom of the social disease we are trying to cure—not the tango itself, but the making a craze of it," said Winston Churchill in an interview at Chicago a few days ago. The celebrated novelist smiled when he was asked for his opinion of the modern dress of women. "It is the apotheosis of all that is frivolous and luxurious in our modern civilization," he said. "It is a representation of something that we are trying to get rid of."

Mr. Churchill was more inclined to talk of the influence of religion upon the modern university student. "There is a movement in theology that is going on very rapidly," he said. "It is the interpretation of religion in the terms of modern science and philosophy.

"The modern university student insists upon having everything squaring—that is, a 'unity of mind.' If he learns his religion in the terms of ancient science and philosophy, goes to the university and has this science and philosophy discredited, then he throws over the religion with them. You can make a university student an agnostic at a stroke or a believer at a stroke."

LONG IN DIPLOMATIC CORPS

Ambassador Rockhill, who has been representing the United States in Turkey, has presented his letter of recall, and thus ends the career of the oldest member, from point of service, of the American diplomatic corps. Mr. Rockhill has held 14 commissions in connection with American foreign affairs, besides having contributed valuable information to science, gained from exploring expeditions through Tibet and other countries while on leave from the diplomatic service. The present treaty governing relations between China and the United States is the work of his hand. He was the commissioner of the United States in preparing the protocol that ended the Boxer uprising in China. Mr. Rockhill is regarded as one of the foremost authorities on Chinese matters. He was one of the first white men to travel through Tibet, and his knowledge of the Chinese border questions and familiarity with Russian views upon this factor in Russian foreign policies made his services invaluable to the state department.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Pigeon Objected to an Unceremonious Expulsion

WISH WE HAD SOME SALT

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—The squad of bluecoats had assembled at the central station for the midnight change of shifts. The stalwart policemen formed in line and started to march in a short review before roll call when, amid the tramping of feet, Lieutenant Green noticed a little blue-gray pigeon marching bravely along just behind the last man in line, head erect, chest out and with very much of a military air.

"Halt," cried the lieutenant. The line came to an instant stop. "How'd that pigeon get in here?" he demanded sharply.

At once two dozen helmeted heads turned about on two dozen shoulders, and as many sets of eyes searched out his birdship, who, also, had halted on command. The bird never blinked an eyelash (if birds have eyelashes).

"Get out of here," thundered Lieutenant Green, when his men had failed to answer his question. "Get out! Shoo!" he repeated, as the pigeon cocked its head on one side and looked the commanding officer over. A titter went round the ranks, but was instantly subdued by a glare from the lieutenant.

"Officers Haggerty and Burn, put that pigeon out." And the lieutenant turned his back as if the incident were closed. It would have been closed, too, had not the pigeon objected to this unceremonious expulsion.

"You're a—you're a—well, a mighty impertinent bird," said the lieutenant. Then, even he broke the rules long enough to laugh.

This Girl Won a Husband in Twenty Minutes

MUSH
MAGISTRATE

LOUISVILLE, KY.—Twenty minutes after Miss Lura Blythe of Jeffersonville, Ind., met William B. Morang of Danville, Va., she became his bride. Magistrate Oscar Hay of Jeffersonville, just across the river from Louisville, and a famous Gretna Green, arranged this 20-minute wooing and marriage. Sometime ago a newspaper story was published to the effect that Magistrate Hay would not only perform the marriage ceremony, but would be glad to arrange matches for the bashful lovelorn.

The story came to the notice of Mr. Morang, who is a prosperous contracting carpenter, and he called on Magistrate Hay to find him a wife. Mr. Hay had not meant that part of his offer seriously, but he resolved to "make good."

A match was finally arranged with a Louisville woman, and last Sunday Morang reached Louisville from Danville. He went to the home of his prospective bride and returned to the magistrate's office with a dismal face.

"I can't marry that woman you picked out for me," he said.

"Why not?" asked Mr. Hay.

"She didn't wait for me. She married another fellow a week ago."

"Too bad," said the magistrate. "Well, as I undertook to get you a wife, I'll get you one."

"You'll have to hurry," said Morang. "I've left a lot of business in Danville and I'm going back to night."

The magistrate thought over his list of eligible young women and called up Miss Lura Blythe, daughter of Calvin Blythe, who lived near. He gave such a glowing description of Morang that Miss Blythe came right over to meet him.

At seven o'clock they were introduced. Ten minutes later they announced that they had accepted each other, and ten minutes later Magistrate Hay performed the marriage ceremony.

Exonerated From Theft Charge by Dog's Tricks

NOW, ROLL OVER

KANSAS CITY, MO.—Tricks which a bird dog remembered for three years and demonstrated in Justice Charles Clark's courtroom the other day freed its master of a charge of grand larceny. Wiley A. Card, formerly of 2700 Denver avenue, was charged with the theft of Roxie from the home of W. J. Glover, 414 West Forty-second street. Glover had owned the dog a little more than two years. Card said the dog belonged to him and had wandered from home three weeks before. When he passed the Glover home he said it recognized him and followed him away.

"It's mine," spoke Card from the witness stand, "and I can make her do some tricks that will prove it."

"Oh, no, you can't," Glover said. "It doesn't know any tricks."

"Rox," spoke Card. The dog advanced to the open space in front of the defendant's chair.

"Stand up!"

The dog arose to its hind legs, cocked its head to one side and looked at the witness. Card took a small paper box from his pocket. He tossed it into the air. Roxie retrieved it before it touched the floor.

"Now, roll over and then go shut the door."

The dog promptly rolled over, and then pushed the courtroom door shut.

"That's enough," said the justice.

Old Roughneck Cat Claws His Deep Sea Owner

CHICAGO.—Frank McCauley, sometime a deep-sea sailor, thrust across the operating table at the Chicago avenue station the other day two hands that looked as if they had gone half way through a sausage grinder. And while Ambulance Surgeon Helwig was sewing and bandaging, McCauley explained:

"Me an' old Roughneck—that's my cat—was sittin' peaceful on the quarterdeck of my apartment at 228 West Superior street, snoozin' in the sunshine, enjoyin' the Sabbath calm.

"All of a sudden a pirate-lookin' rat—meanest-appearin' rat you ever saw—scoots out o' the cook's cabin and jumps clear out in the middle o' the back yard.

"'The rats is leavin' the ship,' I yells, which in deep-water language amounts to the same thing as sayin', 'Man the lifeboats.' But it seems to have a different meaning for Roughneck.

"Roughneck was lyin' asleep in my lap—but the way he sleeps is like the sleepin' of a battery with the switch turned off. Just that simple word 'rats,' it appears, was the switch to the battery for that cat.

"Anyway, up jumps Roughneck and digs his hind claws into my stomach as he starts to take up the pursuit o' that rat."

The surgeon pasted down the final bandage and inquired:

"What are you going to do to punish Roughneck?"

"Well," said the sailor, "Roughneck did do a lot to me, but, on the other hand, I kept Roughneck away from that rat. I guess me and Roughneck is about even."

CONGRESS MEETS; MUCH WORK AHEAD

BOTH HOUSES CONVENE AFTER HOLIDAY RECESS — IMPORTANT LEGISLATION PENDING.

ANTI-TRUST AMENDMENT DUE

Controversy Over Canal Tolls Will Be Reopened by Adamson Resolution —La Follette Seaman's Bill Is Likely to Be Modified.

Washington, Jan. 12. — Legislative matter of great importance are before congress to be handled during the present session which convened today following the Christmas recess. While not as yet on the calendars of either house, an amendment to the anti-trust law will be taken up, following a special message from President Wilson recommending the adoption of a clarifying amendment.

Question of Canal Tolls.

Some time during the season the Adamson resolution introduced just before the last session adjourned, will be brought up, and will reopen all of the old controversy regarding the Panama canal tolls. The Adamson resolution provides for the suspension for two years of that provision of the Panama act which will give free tolls to American coastwise shipping.

Much interest has been displayed in the La Follette seamen's bill, which is supposed to have the firm backing of the Seamen's union and is said to be opposed by the steamship companies operating on the great lakes, and along the coasts. There has been much discussion of this bill among members of congress and it is evident that there is to be considerable controversy when it is brought up. The La Follette bill has alread passed the senate and hearings have been held upon it by the merchant marine and fisheries committee of the house.

La Follette Safety Bill.

The La Follette bill is said to contain rather drastic provisions relative to the safety to life and limb of passengers and employes upon vessels. The steamship companies assert that the adoption of the bill by congress would put out of business every excursion steamer on the great lakes and summer resort steamers throughout the United States. Some steamship owners assert that if it were necessary to comply with the provisions of such a law their steamers would be crowded to capacity by their crews and the large number of life boats they would be compelled to carry. The house committee will hold further hearings on the bill and there seems to be some belief that it will be modified before being taken up on the floor.

On the calendar of the senate is the joint resolution providing for an amendment to the constitution to give suffrage to women. Suffragettes all over the country will follow the progress of this resolution, and it is likely that many of them will appear before congress.

The Owen bill providing a legislative reference bureau, to give expert advice and information on legislative matters to members of congress, modeled after the bureau maintained for the benefit of the legislature of Wisconsin, is also well up to the senate calendar.

Other Important Matters.

The Adamson bill for the establishment of a public health service of greater scope than the public health and marine hospital service will come before the house, as well as the Clapp bill, which passed the senate last session, prohibiting the sending of campaign contributions from one state to another, and which heads the house calendar. Following the Clapp bill on the schedule are the Booher bill, relative to inter-state commerce in convict made goods, and the Burnett bill to regulate immigration, containing an educational provision. This bill, which was passed by the last congress and vetoed by President Taft, is almost certain against to arouse a storm of controversy.

Sunday's Immense Tabernacle.

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Second only to the interest in Rev. Billy Sunday's whirlwind addresses during his recent evangelistic campaign here was that aroused by the immense wooden tabernacle which was erected under the direction of his expert builder to house the throngs which attended the meetings. There was ample seating capacity for 10,000 persons in the great structures and the choir seated several hundred singers.

Aviator Dashed to Pieces.

Santiago, Chile, Jan. 12.—Lieutenant Mery, a military aviator, fell from a height of 3,000 feet and was dashed to pieces.

Segregated Districts Scored.

Superior, Wis., Jan. 12.—The Wisconsin vice commission's investigation here resolved itself into an arraignment of Superior's segragation system of controlling the social evil, the witnesses examined being almost unanimous in their condemnation of the restricted district. The first witnesses were mostly local reform leaders and all took advantage of the opportunity to unreservedly criticize the municipal authorities for failure to abolish the system.

BIG BANKS ADOPTING SYSTEM

INSTITUTIONS ENDORSE NEW CURRENCY PLAN.

Resources of Twenty-eight Given Out Total Billion and a Half.

Washington, Jan. 12.—Names of some of the larger national banks which have noted their intention to accept the provisions of the new currency law have just been made public by the treasury department. The list embraces institutions which have total resources of $20,000,000 or more and includes five banks, each with resources of $100,000,000 or more. Resources of the twenty-eight banks named aggregate more than a billion and a half dollars. The list follows:

Boston.—National Shawmut, Merchants' National.

New York City—National Park, Mechanics and Metals National, Chase National, Liberty National, National Bank of Commerce.

Baltimore—Merchants and Mechanics National.

Pittsburgh—Union National.

Cincinnati — Fifty-third National, First National.

SOME ANTI-TRUST PLANS OUT

Bills Framed, Covering Three Main Issues of Complex Problem.

Washington, Jan. 12.—A general outline of the tentative draft of anti-trust legislation prepared by majority members of the house committee on the judiciary, for action by the full committee, subject to a conference with President Wilson, has just become known.

The bills cover these three main points:

1—Interlocking directorates.

2—Trade relations and prices.

3—Injunction proceedings and damage suits by individuals.

In every case President Wilson's idea of providing penalties for individuals as well as for corporations in case of violations has been followed.

$130,000 Bank to be Built.

Grand Forks.—A modern banking home, costing $130,000, will be constructed in Grand Forks this year by the Scandinavian American bank. Plans for the structure have about been completed and within the next two months the contract will be let. Adopting the new plan in vogue in the east, the banking rooms will be on the second floor. The first floor will be used for stores. The structure will be five stories high, and will replace the Ingalls house, one of the city's oldest landmarks.

Rumored Wilson May Select Taft.

New Haven, Conn., Jan. 12.—According to a rumor here which cannot be verified President Wilson may appoint ex-President Taft chief justice when Justice White retires soon. The source of the report was a man who has just returned from Pass Christian, Miss.

W. C. T. U. Favors Suffrage.

Bismarck, Jan. 12.—The ballot in the hands of North Dakota women would prove an effective means of forever keeping the state within the ranks of prohibition commonwealths, according to the executive committee of the North Dakota W. C. T. U., which laid plans to participate actively in the campaign for suffrage, on which the vote will be taken this year. The committee will send speakers into every county in the state, and will maintain headquarters at Jamestown.

STRIKE STATUS IS MORE COMPLICATED

PRESIDENT MOYER ANNOUNCES INTENTION TO STAY IN COPPER BELT.

GRAND JURY IS CRITICISED

Proceedings to Be Attacked in Courts, It Is Said—Governor Departs Without Making Effort to End Walkout.

Houghton, Mich., Jan. 12.—Declaration of Charles H. Moyer that he intends to remain in the copper strike district as long as he pleases, intimations from union sources that the grand jury proceedings are to be attacked on legal grounds, and the departure of Governor Ferris without his making a direct effort to settle the trouble marks the progress of the local industrial war.

Moyer at Mass Meeting.

Mr. Moyer appeared before a mass meeting of strikers and sympathizers which crowded the largest hall in Hancock beyond its capacity. Except for his five-minute address the gathering had a socialistic tinge, the other speakers including Seymour Stedman of the investigation committee, J. W. Lord of Peoria, Ill., and several local Socialists.

Mr. Moyer explained that under the advice of physicians he could not make an extended address and then said:

"I came back here because I had a right to. Under the laws of Michigan and the constitution of the United States, I am entitled to protection. Those responsible for my leaving on December 26 violated the laws of the state and nation by taking the law into their own hands and committed a crime for which they must be punished if there is any law at all in the state of Michigan.

Shot Was at All.

"When the shot was fired into my back it was not into Moyer alone, but that shot reached every miner on the continent. It was a shot in the back of the working class and especially into the back of all organized wage workers."

He said there had been no change in the policy of the Western Federation of Miners and then referred to a statement made by Governor Ferris earlier in the day "that advice of outsiders would do more than anything else to prolong the strike."

The union leader said he had telegraphed to the governor that he accepted the state executive's opinion that a conference between the men and employers would settle the difficulty and asked him to propose such action "to bring about a settlement and get the men back to work."

Interest in Grand Jury.

Interest in grand jury proceedings was intensified by the governor's declaration that he would take no executive action while the judicial machinery of the state was in motion. Intimations came from the union's attorneys that the presence of Grant Fellows, attorney general of the state, in the jury room, had voided the body's legality and there was no Michigan law that would permit the county to hire George Nichols as special prosecutor under the circumstances in force here.

Mr. Fellows was quick to defend his course, saying that he not only was in the grand jury room, but had questioned Moyer.

"No statute on the Michigan books prohibited this action and as chief legal officer of the state I had a perfect right to be present," he said.

Afrikanders Try to Wreck Trains.

Johannesburg, Union of South Africa, Jan. 12.—Attempts to blow up the Cape mail train between Denver and Jeorge Goch brought the strike of the South African railway men to a head. No one on board the train was hurt, the wheels of the engine being blown off and the track damaged. A second explosion occurred on the railway between Johannesburg and Cleveland. Another attempt to wreck a train was made between Witpoortie and Liupaardsvlei.

SIGNS POINT TO PROSPERITY

BUSINESS GOOD IN 1914 IS FORECAST OF TRUST BUSTER.

Tells New Yorkers Sound Conditions Prevail Throughout the West—Other Views.

New York, Jan. 10.—The signs of the times point to prosperity in the opininn of Frank B. Kellogg, of St. Paul, the former trust buster, who was retained as special counsel by the interstate commerce commission in its investigation of the Harriman railroad merger.

On the general question of interlocking directorates, Mr. Kellogg believes that the action of J. Pierpont Morgan and his partners in withdrawing from the directorates of a large number of railroad and industrial corporations was a wise move.

"Do you think the eastern railroads are entitled to an increase in rates?" he was asked.

"I think the railroads need some additional revenue," Mr. Kellogg replied, "and that the interstate commerce commission should authorize an increase. I believe this will be done. It will have a very beneficial effect, not only on railroads, but on business conditions."

Mr. Kellogg thinks the currency bill recently passed by congress is a good measure, despite the fact that there were serious objections to it in its first stages.

"Business conditions in the West are very good," Mr. Kellogg said. "Financial, mercantile and business houses generally are in a sound condition. We had good crops in most of that country, good prices and the farmers are prosperous.

"There has been some slowing up and a good deal of conservatism during the last two months, undoubtedly partly attributable to apprehension of the effects of the tariff and other government policies. I think, however, that in the last two weeks sentiment has much improved.

"There is more confidence than there was before, and I see no reason why 1914 will not be a good business year."

NO COALITION, SAY MOOSERS

Progressives of Iowa Oppose Amalgamation—Adopt Principles.

Des Moines, Iowa, Jan. 12.—The state conference of the Progressive party, which closed here after a two-day session, declared itself opposed to amalgamation with any other party and made plans for putting a candidate in the field for every office in Iowa to be filled next November.

Following are the principles adopted: Presidential preference primary; opposition to invisible government through subsidized press and lobbies; laws to be passed only after public discussion; control and regulation of industrial combinations by government board; correction of court abuses; inferior federal judges to be elected by popular ballot; legal regulation of labor conditions, abolishment of child labor; granting of woman suffrage; rural credits; use of state receipts from hunters' licenses to replenish game stock; automobile licenses to make permanent highways; creation of Progressive clubs; initiative, referendum and recall.

Failed to Renew Fire Policy.

Aberdeen, S. D., Jan. 12.—Fire at Peever, a small town in Roberts county, destroyed an entire block on the west side of Main street, causing an estimated loss of $50,000, with $25,000 insurance. The heaviest loser is Mr. Hines, whose insurance policies expired the first of the year and who had neglected to renew them.

Ban on Sand-Fed Chickens.

Washington, Jan. 12.—Convinced that the public has been "the innocent purchaser" of great quantities of rock and sand in the guise of poultry, the department of agriculture has ordered an investigation into shipping conditions. It is charged poultry is "fattened" with adulterated food mixtures containing minerals. The people of New York city alone, the department estimates, buy every week from 150,000 to 300,000 pounds of sand and rock substances, paying prevailing poultry prices.

Good Bowels Are An Aid to Growth

Growing Children Need a Mild Laxative to Foster Regular Bowel Movement.

MARIE DEY

As a child grows older it requires more and more personal attention from the mother, and as the functions of the bowels are of the utmost importance to health, great attention should be paid to them.

Diet is of great importance, and the mother should watch the effect of certain foods. A food will constipate one and not another, and so we have a healthy food like eggs causing biliousness to thousands, and a wholesome fruit like bananas constipating many. It is also to be considered that the child is growing, and great changes are taking place in the young man or young woman. The system has not yet settled itself to its later routine.

A very valuable remedy at this stage, and one which every growing boy and girl should be given often or occasionally, according to the individual circumstances, is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This is a laxative and tonic combined, so mild that it is given to little babies, and yet equally effective in the most robust constitution. At the first sign of a tendency to constipation give a small dose of Syrup Pepsin at night on retiring, and prompt action will follow in the morning. It not only acts on the stomach and bowels but its tonic properties build up and strengthen the system generally, which is an opinion shared by Mr. John Dey of Bloomfield, N. J. He has a large family and at ages where the growth and development must be watched. Little Marie has thrived especially well on Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Mr. Dey considers it the right laxative for young and old and has found none better for young children.

The use of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin will teach you to avoid cathartics, salts and pills, as they are too harsh for the majority and their effect is only temporary. Syrup Pepsin brings permanent results, and it can be conveniently obtained of any nearby druggist at fifty cents and one dollar a bottle. Results are always guaranteed or money will be refunded.

Families wishing to try a free sample bottle can obtain it postpaid by addressing Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 Washington St., Monticello, Ill. A postal card with your name and address on it will do.

Electrically Lighted Hens.

In the face of a world-wide tendency toward shorter hours for the worker, a determined effort is being made in England to make the hen work overtime. The motto of the movement is "A longer working day for hens." It has current interest just now because of the row over the high price of eggs—the purpose of the "long day" obviously being a larger crop of eggs per hen. Mr. William H. Cook has, for nearly a year, kept his poultry house lighted artificially in the early morning and evening. He uses 300 incandescent electric lamps, and has them so arranged that he can imitate sunrise and sunset by turning them on or off gradually.

BACKACHE VANISHES RHEUMATIC PAINS GO

Few Doses of Croxone Ease Stiff, Sore, Swollen Joints and Muscles, Relieving Backache and Bladder Disorders.

If you suffer with backache—have pains in the neck or sides—nervous or dizzy spells—a few doses of Croxone will relieve the congestion and you will be surprised how quickly all kidney, bladder and rheumatic troubles will disappear.

Croxone promptly relieves these diseases because it really does reach the real cause. It soaks right into the walls and linings of the kidneys, cleans out the stopped-up inactive organs, neutralizes and dissolves the uric acid and makes the kidneys sift from the blood the waste and poisonous matter that lodge in the joints and muscles to scratch and irritate and cause rheumatism. It soothes and heals the delicate linings of the bladder and gives the kidneys renewed strength so they can filter the blood and keep you well.

Croxone is different from all other remedies. It is so prepared that it is practically impossible to take it without results. An original package of Croxone costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if it should fail in a single case.—Adv.

Calumet the Secret of Economy

The high cost of living nowadays, and the way prices are steadily climbing skywards, is making economy in the kitchen even more important than it was in the good old days of our thrifty ancestors. But how to achieve economy? There's the rub!

In many lines, it depends almost entirely on the housewife's knowledge of foods and on her watchfulness—but fortunately, in one line, baking, economy can be made almost automatic by the use of the famous Calumet Baking Powder.

Economy in baking, as every good cook knows, depends not so much on economy in buying the materials as on the success of her bakings. Failures mean waste—bigger losses by far than the savings she makes in buying. And the fact that Calumet absolutely prevents failures and makes every baking successful has made it the favorite of every cook that seeks to be economical. In other words, Calumet is the secret of economy in baking.

It is the purest, too—attested by hundreds of leading physicians—and as for its general quality, it is enough to say that Calumet has received the highest awards at two World's Pure Food Expositions—one in Chicago, Ill., and the other in Paris, France, in March, 1912. Adv.

The Secret of Health is Elimination of Waste

Every business man knows how difficult it is to keep the pigeon holes and drawers of his desk free from the accumulation of useless papers. Every housewife knows how difficult it is to keep her home free from the accumulation of all manner of useless things. So it is with the body. It is difficult to keep it free from the accumulation of waste matter. Unless the waste is promptly eliminated the machinery of the body soon becomes clogged. This is the beginning of most human ills.

The MARSHAL

by MARY RAYMOND SHIPMAN ANDREWS

ILLUSTRATIONS by ELLSWORTH YOUNG

COPYRIGHT 1912 BY BOBBS MERRILL CO.

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, in the home of the lad's parents in the village of Vicques, France, where the emperor had briefly stopped to hold a council of war. Napoleon prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois meets a stranger who is astonished when the boy tells him of his ambition. Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns.

"Tiens! We will play again for another bottle," he announced with a bit of swagger. He was conscious of a right to spend silver in treating his friends, with that fat purse in his pocket.

"No," spoke the stranger—Duplessis, he had said his name was. "No. I have drunk enough. However, if you feel sensitive at taking the small sum of money at my hands—it is a good game—La rams—let us play for the franc which the bottle would cost. Eh bien!"

Again they played, this time doubling the amount, and again Francois gained, and again and again, till he felt ashamed in carrying away all this money of a new acquaintance, and at the same time a cock-sureness that so lucky a devil as Beaupre might well lose a little and stop at the right amount. The excitement of cards and excitement of wine met in a heady mixture; Duplessis drank little, though Francois urged it on him. The luck began to change; now and then the stranger won, now and then Beaupre, yet more often now the stranger, till at length Francois was playing not with the desire to lose, but with a hope to gain back something at least of the considerable sum which he had lost. Before this he had gone into his pocket and brought out that honorable nine hundred francs, and had thrown one louis d'or after another on the black table, and lost one after another. Yet his confidence was still strong—luck would turn—this was his lucky day. And now he would not regret carrying away the stranger's money. He began to feel a fierce eagerness to get the better of this antagonist became so formidable. And a horrible nervousness was creeping over him at the dim vision of a thought—a thought kept resolutely on the confines of his consciousness, yet persistently pushing forward—the thought that it might be that he could not win the money back.

"Double!" he shouted promptly as he lost again.

And he lost again. The nine hundred francs were gone; he gave a note now, on his stock, and again he lost. A deathly sickening sensation had gripped him and was holding him.

In silence, with a crowd of silent men, who in some way had come to know what was happening, standing about them, the two played the last round. And Francois lost.

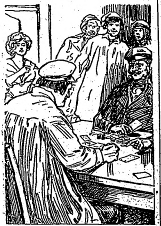
In silence he signed the note which gave to the stranger his house and furniture and land, all that he had in the world.

CHAPTER VI.

Work and Hope.

The next day a sheriff and his clerk came and fixed red seals to the house and to everything in it which locked, and Claire watched in a deep quiet, the baby in her arms.

Something had been said already of sending the children to this or that uncle or aunt—there would in a short time be no home and no living for them until the broken father could gather himself and begin again. Little Francois resolved that he would not go. He would stay with his father and prove that eleven was not too young to make money. As he stood watching the sheriff who moved gloomily about his unwelcome duty he was aware of a horse's hoofs beating down the road, and he turned. In the midst of his grief it was interesting to see the Baron-General Gourgaud coming on his bay mare Lesitte. The general drew up beside him and looked at him sternly.



The Nine Hundred Francs Were Gone.

"Where is your father?" he shot at him, and threw a leg over and vaulted off and flung the mare's reins to the lad, and swung into the great entry and through the open door into the cottage.

Francois, though broken-hearted, was but eleven, and it was a proud thing to hold the seigneur's horse and pleasant to see the spirited beast paw the earth as he held her. He was so entranced with this occupation that he forgot his bruised life and his lost career entirely. For fifteen minutes he forgot, and the other children gathered around him, and he ordered them away from the horse and felt himself its guardian and an important person, with complete satisfaction.

And at that, out of the house came the seigneur, big and black-browed and solid of tread, and with him that broken-hearted father whose face recalled all the tragedy.

"Francois," his father spoke, more gently than ever he had spoken before, "I have taken your future from you, my son. The seigneur wishes to give it back. He wishes to make you his child. Your mother consents—and I—I consent." His father's arm was about his neck. The general's abrupt voice took up the statement.

"Will you come and live with me in the chateau, Monsieur the Marshal?" he demanded roughly, kindly. "I will treat you as a son—you shall learn to ride a horse and shoot a gun and be a soldier. You shall fit yourself for the part which we know must be played one day. Will you come?"

For a moment it seemed to Francois that heaven had opened and a miracle of joy come down; then it flashed to his mind that this dazzling gift had a price. With a whole soul Francois cast away the brilliant dream and hardly felt an effort.

"I thank you a thousand times, my seigneur," he answered with decision. "I cannot go with you. I must stay and work for my father and my mother."

There was silence for a minute in the sunshiny garden; the children had wandered away; the men did not speak; one heard only the more Lisette whom Francois held, who stamped her light forefoot and whinnied impatiently. Then the general's grave voice sounded, more gravely than ever.

"Francois Beaupre, you own a fine lad," he threw at the drooping peasant. "I would like to have him for mine. Since I cannot, I shall try at least to be his friend. Monsieur the Marshal, it must be as you say. But come to see me at the chateau soon. I shall have things to talk over with you."

On a morning Francois was busy at the new garden, digging beds for the plants which the neighbors had eagerly given them, and which, put in the ground now, in the autumn, would rise above them in brightness next spring.

Into this contentment came, galloping gloriously, hoof beats of a horse. The busy spade, several sizes too big, stopped, and Francois leaned his chin on the handle, the boy out of drawing for the tool. The general stopped, which was a heavenly surprise to Francois each time that it happened.

"Good morning, marshal. Will you ask your mother if I may speak to her?"

"Mother, mother, the seigneur wishes you," Francois whispered piercingly, but Claire was already on the little front walk by the new garden.

In a moment she stood at the gate in her fresh calico dress, with a white fichu over her head, and the big man towered and growled sentences friendlily. Then the general trotted with jingling stirrup down the village street and Claire stood with eyes following for a moment.

"What did the seigneur say, my mother?" Francois demanded. "Did he say I might come to the chateau tomorrow? May I? Am I to know what the general said, my mother?"

After his father came home to dinner he knew. He was to go each morning to the chateau and do work in copying for the general. The general was writing a book, nothing less than a history of Napoleon himself. The boy's great dreamy eyes glowed.

So the little lad, in his clean, patched, peasant clothes, went up to the chateau the next morning serious and important, and was given a table and a corner in the library and words to copy which thrilled his soul.

Often the general talked to him. "Eh bien, there, the marshal!" would come thundering from the great table across the room; and the scribe would drop his pen and scuttle over the dim wide place.

"Yes, Monsieur the Seigneur. I am here."

"Listen then, my soldier. I am uncertain if this that I have written is of importance. It is interesting to me, because Gaspard Gourgaud was there, yet I do not wish to ram Gaspard Gourgaud down a reader's throat."

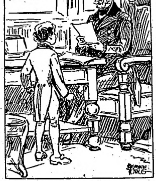
Francois squatted on a stool exactly in front of the general, with his knees together and his elbows on them, his chin in the hollow of his hands. His eyes were glued on the general's face. In a deep voice the general read. It was an account of that world-tragedy, the retreat from Moscow. First came a list of regiments and of officers, with detailed accounts of early service in both; it was exact, accurate. For five minutes the general read this; then his black eyebrows lifted and he glared over the paper.

"You find it interesting?" he demanded.

Francois, lips compressed, shook his head firmly. "No, my Seigneur. Not at all."

"I agree with you," the general said, and sorted the papers over and laid some away. Selecting a sheet or two, he began to read again.

"Over the frozen roads the worn army still trudged; every form of misery trudged with them. Hunger was there, and cold, and suffering of wounds, and suffering of lack of clothing; more than this, there was the constant dread of attack from flying bands of Cossacks. From time to time frightful explosions made one turn one's head—it was the caissons exploded by order of the Emperor that they might no longer encumber us. The snow fell. The Emperor marched on foot with us. Staff in hand, wrapped in a large loose cloak, a furred Russian cap on his head, he walked in the midst of his household, encouraging with a word, with a smile, every one who came near him.



The Little Figure Had Sprung Up, and Stood, Threatening.

"There were many adventures which showed the souls of men shining through the nightmare of this horrible time. Many noble deeds were done, many heartbreaking ones. One which was both happened to me. There was an Italian officer in the corps under Prince Eugene, who had been my comrade when I was on the staff of Lannes; his name was Zappi—the Marquis Zappi. On the day after the dreadful passing of the Beresina River, I suddenly felt my strength go—I could walk no longer. A sick loathing seized me, and I groaned and dragged my heavy feet forward, to stay with my friends even a few steps more. And with that an arm was around me suddenly, and I heard Zappi's quiet voice.

"'Keep up your courage, comrade; we are going to see our homes yet,' he said. 'I shall take care of you Look'—and I looked, and he had a sledge with fur robes on it. I never knew where he got it—from some deserted Russian house, I suppose. He put me on the sledge and wrapped me in the furs and gave me brandy from his flask. For Zappi had done a clever thing. He had made a bargain with some Jesuits near Polotsk, where he had camped for a while, that his men should cut and beat the wheat necessary on condition that he should have a part of the brandy for them. He had kept some of his share yet, and it saved my life that day, the brandy of the monks of Polotsk."

"There was a thick fog several days later, and out of it, and out of the wood we must pass, rushed with wild cries a cloud of mounted Cossacks across the road within twenty paces of the Emperor himself. But, General Rapp dashed forward at the head of two mounted squadrons of chasseurs and grenadiers of the guard who always followed the Emperor, and the Cossacks were put to flight. I was in charge; I was serving temporarily in the place of one of Rapp's officers, because, on account of my late weakness, it was thought well that I should be on horseback. So it happened that, as the skirmish finished, I saw coming toward me a figure in a furred coat and cap, brandishing a Cossack lance—rushing toward the Emperor. I dashed down on the mad Cossack, as I thought him, and passed my great saber through his body. And the man fell, and as he fell the fur cap went off and he groaned and looked up at me with dying eyes—it was Zappi."

"Ah!" The little figure had sprung up and stood, fists clenched, threatening. One would have thought it was this second that the general had sabred Zappi.

"May I live a moment?" the general inquired. "Till I explain. Zappi did not die."

"Ah!" again. And Francois sank relieved on the stool, yet with stern eyes still on the general's face. The general laid the papers aside.

"Not he. He had seized the lance from a Russian whom he had killed—it was most imprudent, especially in the dress he wore, which did not show the French uniform underneath. It was my turn then to play nurse. He was placed in one of the carriages of the Emperor, and I cared for him as my own brother, and he came through it all, and went back to Italy, to his home."

The general's deep-set eyes were gazing now above Francois' head out through the narrow window where the boy's table stood, across the mountain slope, to the blue distance.

"Alessandro, my friend," he spoke in his gruff tones, yet softly, "shall we see each other again? So close through that black time, so far apart now in the peace of our homes! Those warm hands which cared for me when I was freezing and dying in Russia—I shall touch them perhaps never again, never again!"

CHAPTER VII.

The Crown of Friendship.

In the claw-footed, carved, old mahogany desk of a Virginia house, in a drawer where are packets of yellowed letters tied up and labeled, is a letter written years later, referring to that earlier time in France. Perhaps this bit of the chronicle of Francois Beaupre could not be told so vividly as in these words of Francois written from his prison. He begins with the account of an adventure, of a ride for life.

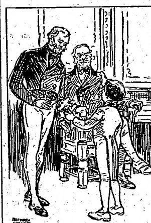
"So, dear Alixe," he finishes this—the detailed story of his capture—"down went the poor horse, and over his head I spun into the ditch with a bump on the skull which dazed me. And when I came to there were the heavy Austrians around me, gaping to see the Prince. And only Francois Beaupre to see, which they found out pretty promptly, as I have told you before, and also how I defied them.

"In a great danger they say one thinks more clearly than usual—one's mind works with smoothness and at leisure. It was so during that ride, for I followed out as I dashed along, hearing the shouts of the men back of me, the whole train of circumstances from one of those mornings with Coq in the park, to this adventure of life and death. It was the morning—you will know before I say it—when Jean Phillippe Moison, in his lovely purple clothes, came mincing down the graveled drive, as if afraid of spoiling his good shoes—and I think he was—to the seigneur, who taught us to ride Coq. Do you remember how your father thundered at him?

"'A strange monsieur to see me? Impossible! I am engaged. Tell him I will not see him.'

"And Jean Phillippe smiling, for all of them understood the seigneur, and saying gently, 'Yes, my Seigneur,' turned away with the message. And your father shouted after him:

"'Stop! Come back here! What do you mean by that? Bring the monsieur to me.' And the purple clothes disappeared and appeared again in a few minutes gleaming in the sun against the gray old walls—I can see it all now, Alixe—like a large violet blossom of a strange flower. And behind Jean Phillippe was a tall man in a long traveling cloak, and behind him a tall little boy. And as they came the seigneur turned to go to meet them, and stopped and stared. And the monsieur in the cloak stopped and stared; and you, mounted on Coq, and I, holding Coq's bridle, watched curiously, because of the other child, and we saw how the seigneur suddenly began to shake as if ill, and then with a hoarse shout rushed to the tall man and threw his arms about him and held him, and sobbed aloud. That was a strange thing to see the seigneur do, and I never forgot it. And to think that the child who stood there, shy and unknown, was Pietro! It seems unreasonable that ever there was a time when you and Pietro and I did not know one another well.



The Marquis Received It With Grave Courtesy.

"As I rode that day, with the Austrians after me, I thought out the whole chain of events; how Pietro had come and had stayed while his father, the marquis, went to America, and had fitted into our life and become dear to us, the big, beautiful, silent lad. And how then, because of the death of the marquis, Pietro had come under the charge of your father, the seigneur, and how he and I went away together to the military school, always more and more like brothers and—all the rest. I need not recite those things to you, yet I like to do it. My thoughts, in that wild dangerous moment, seemed to go in detail through all, from the morning that the Marquis Zappi arrived with his little son at the chateau, through the ten years of our life together, to my coming into Italy as his secretary—and from that, by a rapid step, to this castle prison."

The rest of the letter belongs to a later part of the story. That little Pietro Zappi should be led into the narrative by the hand of his closest friend was the object for which the letter was introduced, and, that accomplished, the course of history bends back to the quiet Valley of Delesmontes and the children growing up under the shadows of the castle towers.

The general, sitting in his library the morning after the arrival chronicled in the quoted letter, stared at his old friend from under his heavy brows as if trying vigorously to convince himself of his presence. The marquis, an Italian of North Italy, tall and proud and quiet, had the air more of a student than of a soldier. A little the air, also, of an invalid, for he stooped and walked languidly, and a cough caught him at times. He was talking, on that morning in the library, while the general listened; it was not the usual order of things.

"So you see, Gaspard," the marquis went on in his quiet reticent way, "that I have believed in our old friendship. I have taken for granted a welcome for my boy—I could not have done it with another man. The voyage to America and my stay there will last, it may be a year. I have brought Pietro to leave him with you if you will have him."

This old officer of Napoleon had, after all his battles and killings, the simplicity and the heart of his own little girl. But he cleared his throat hurriedly with a bravado of carelessness, and before the marquis could do more than smile at him wistfully, he went on:

"It is all settled; there was no need of a word; Pietro is my son till you claim him from me, and glad enough I am to get him for as long as I may. I have a lien on a very good manner of boy already, young Francois Beaupre, whom I wished to adopt, but the lad would not give up his parents. And that makes me more eager for another. They will play better together and work better together, and they will be a good brace of brothers for my Alixe."

"Your Alixe," the marquis spoke reflectively. "She is a charming person, that little woman of yours."

"Alessandro, shall I tell you what flashed into my head before you and Pietro had been here an hour?"

"What then?"

"I saw the children—your boy and my girl—together as if lifelong playmates over the big books in the window-seat there, and it came to me that it would be a joy to crown one's life if—later on—" He stopped and gazed inquiringly at the calm blue eyes which met his.

"Yes," the marquis answered quietly. "It would be that—the crown of our friendship, if some day they might love each other."

CHAPTER VIII.

For Always.

Claire listened with serious calm eyes as her son told his story when he came home on the day of the new arrival at the castle.

"The great gentleman has come who once saved our seigneur's life!" she repeated after Francois. "And the seigneur is glad. Of course he is glad, my Francois. And you ought to be glad, too, and grateful to that gentleman because of all the good things our seigneur has done for you and which would not have happened, assuredly, if Monsieur the Marquis had not saved him. You should do everything that is possible for Monsieur the Marquis to show your gratitude."

Next morning the little brown figure which trudged through the beech wood was brightened by a large and vivid bouquet held in his two hands. When the tap of Francois at the library door, where one heard men's voices talking, had brought the general's loud command of "Entrez," the little brown figure and the large bunch of flowers came in together and the boy marched straight to the stately Italian. Snapping his heels together as his mother had taught him he made a stiff deep bow, and presented his nosegay. The marquis, a little astonished at this attention, received it with grave courtesy, but without much cordiality; it seemed to him rather an odd whim of Gourgaud's to have this peasant child about as one of his own family.

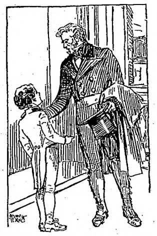
But Francois did not know that; to him all the world was kindly, with different manners of kindliness. The manner of the marquis was graver than other people's, perhaps—what then? The kindliness was undoubtedly there below the gravity. And it was this monsieur who had saved the life of the seigneur; that, after all, was the whole matter. Francois wasted little time thinking of other people's feeling toward himself. He was much too busy with a joyful wonder of his own at the ever new goodness of his world. To the marquis, who hardly noticed him, he proceeded to constitute himself a shadow. At the first sign of a service to be done he was up and at it; always quicker, always more intelligent than the footman.

"You have thrown a charm over my boy Francois, Alessandro," the general said, well pleased. And the marquis answered thoughtfully:

"It is a boy out of the common, I believe, Gaspard. At first I thought it a mistake that you should raise a child of his class to the place you have given him, but I see that you understand what you are about. He is worthy of a good fate."

The day came when, on the next morning, the Marquis Zappi was due to start on his long journey to America. Out on the lawn, in the shadow of the beech trees he sat and watched his son playing ball with little Alixe. Then he was aware of Francois standing before him. The boy held something in his closed hand, and with that he opened his fingers and stretched it to the marquis. The marquis looked inquiringly at the yellow metal.

"What is this?" he asked; he was prepared now to be surprised by this boy about once in so often, so he simply suspended judgment at a thing unexpected.



"Yes, Monsieur, the Marquis, Always."

"It is for you, Monsieur the Marquis." Francois smiled radiantly and continued to present the ten-franc piece. "It is my own; the seigneur gave it to me on my birthday, and my father said it was to be mine to do with as I chose. I choose to give it to you, Monsieur the Marquis. So that you may have plenty of money—I know well what it is not to have enough money."

The brown fist was outstretched, the gold piece glittering in it, and still the marquis stared speechless. Never in his life had any one presumed to offer him money. He looked up at the face of the little peasant; it shone with peace and good will; he put out his hand and took the gold piece and looked at it a long minute, and drew a leather case from his pocket and placed it within carefully, and put it away.

"Thank you, Francois," said the marquis. And then he considered again the shining little face. "Why have you done this, Francois?" he asked. "Why do you always—do so much for me?"

"That thing in Russia, for my seigneur. When you saved the life of my seigneur."

"Oh," said the marquis and stared down at the boy anxiously explaining.

"I have been afraid that I could never show you how I thanked you for the life of my seigneur. But I will do more. I will be a friend of Pietro. He is six months younger than I; I can teach him how to climb and how to fight and how to take care of himself. And I will, because of that thing you did. Because, too, I think well of Pietro and besides because of your kindness to me."

"My kindness to you?"

"Yes, Monsieur the Marquis—because you have been so kind to me."

And the marquis, in the silence of his soul, was ashamed.

The next day he went. As they stood, gathered in the big carved doorway, he told them all goodby and lifted his boy and held him without a word. As he set him down he turned toward the carriage, but in a flash he turned back as if by a sudden inspiration, and laid a hand on little Francois' shoulder.

"You will remember that you promised to be a friend to Pietro, Francois?"

"Yes, Monsieur the Marquis, always," the child answered gravely.

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

The Supreme Court is to pass on the legality of the primary election law, but by the time they get through the election will be over for this year.

There is some talk of putting up John Lind for U. S. Senator in opposition to Senator Clapp, if he gets through with his Mexico job in time to get into the game.

The Country publishers are beginning to be loaded down with free political "send offs" for candidates for office, who think that every one is of the opinion, that if they are not elected, that the country has gone to the dogs, and if the people just know they are candidates there will be a rush of voters for them.

Some of our exchanges are mentioning Elias Steenerson as a progressive candidate for governor. As there is to be the usual number of filings for this big office this year, Eli may as well get into the bunch, for he would certainly be all right for the position.

Governor Eberhart is fortunate in having so many good men opposed to him, who are all indorsed by the people. This year will only be a repetition of the two years ago campaign, when Adolph defeated the bunch easily. But he may yet run against a man that will let him know he is in a race, if the Democratic party make a good nomination.

Congressman Steenerson has his bill ready to introduce for the opening of the Red Lake Indian Reservation lying east of here, just as soon as the engineer has his maps and estimates ready. The government engineer will reccommend the improvement of the Red Lake River to properly drain these lands, which will be necessary as the present drainage ditches that empty into this river will cause it to flood badly during a heavy rainy season.

C. L. Hanson of Thief River Fallf has formerly announced himselt as candidate for State Senator from this district, and asks the support of the voters at the primaries to be held on June 16th. We rather like the ring of his platform, which comes out openly, with no little side dodges in it to catch votes. Mr. Hanson is the first to get into the political game which starts early this year, thus showing that he is right up to date. He does not dodge the issue on one plank in his platform which is "Equal Sufferage for Women." That's the stuff let the women vote, for lots of them are more intelligent than some of the men.

The new bridge for the Electric Line Railway will be completed across the Thief River above Thief River Falls before spring, which will give the company free sailing east. They have already secured the right of way, and the people, we are pleased to note are taking hold and rendering all the assistance possible by subscribing liberally for stock, which the farmers will get returned in the raise of the price of their lands and the establishing of a nearby market for their produce. This is not an expensive territory to build over and there is no reason why the line should not be a big paying investment for the stock holders.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate, I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion, should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities,

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON,
Thief River Falls, Minn.

The fellows who have been gentelmen in office, and looked after the interest of the common people will see the bread that they cast upon the waters return to them, in the shape of votes this summer.

WONDERFUL COUGH REMEDY.

Dr. King's New Discovery is known everywhere as the remedy which will surely stop a cough or cold. D. P. Churchyard Yew Trees.

One reason given why very old yew trees are so often found in country churchyards is that originally these trees were planted to supply the peasants with wood for their bows, for in lawless times it was soon discovered that the only place where trees would be safe from nightly marauders was the churchyard, where the most hardened thief dared not venture between darkness and dawn.—London Mail.

Counting by Knots.

It was the custom of the Aztecs to keep their accounts by means of strings. The numbers were indicated by knots. A single knot was ten, two single knots twenty, and so on. The hundreds were indicated by double knots. The color of the string indicated what the numbers referred to. Soldiers were red, gold yellow, silver white and corn green. This method is still in use on the sierras of the Argentina, where the herdsmen keep tale of their charges in a similar way. Several strands depend from one, the first of these strands being reserved for bulls, the next for cows, the milk and dry being differentiated; the next for sheep, and so on. Knots were probably among the first methods of man to record figures—the knot or the mark on a bit of stick. In the English hop gardens the tallyman (generally the local schoolmaster) goes around with the tally and its mark, and the most civilized Chicagoan still ties a knot in his handkerchief when he is asked "to be sure to remember."—Chicago News.

Tennyson and the Horse.

Tennyson once arrived at Haslemere station carrying a parcel of books, and as his own carriage had not arrived to meet him he was glad to accept the offer of a lift home. Going up the steep hill to Blackdown, Tennyson, with his characteristic consideration for animals, suggested that they and the books were too heavy for the pony to drag. The two men therefore got out and walked for some distance in front of the trap, until they discovered that the books had dropped out. The owner of the pony asked Tennyson to stand at the animal's head while he went back for the books. These he found a hundred yards or more down the hill, and on his return he found the pony had been restive, but had quickly become quiet. Knowing that it disliked strangers, he wondered how Mr. Tennyson had kept it quiet. What was his surprise to learn that the poet had managed the affair by holding a watch close to the animal's ear.

BICYCLE DEALERS, you can sell our bicycles under your own name plate at double our prices. Orders filled the day received.

SECOND HAND BICYCLES. We do not regularly handle second hand bicycles, but usually have a number on hand taken in trade by our Chicago retail stores. These we clear out promptly at prices ranging from $3 to $8 or $10. Descriptive bargain lists mailed free.

COASTER-BRAKES, single wheels, imported roller chains and pedals, parts, repairs and equipment of all kinds at half the regular retail prices.

$10.00 Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof Self-healing Tires A SAMPLE PAIR TO INTRODUCE, ONLY $4.80

The regular retail price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but to introduce we will sell you a sample pair for $4.80 (cash with order $4.55).

NO MORE TROUBLE FROM PUNCTURES

NAILS, Tacks, or Glass will not let the air out. A hundred thousand pairs sold last year.

DESCRIPTION: Made in all sizes. It is lively and easy riding, very durable and lined inside with a special quality of rubber, which never becomes porous and which closes up small punctures without allowing the air to escape. We have hundreds of letters from satisfied customers stating that their tires have only been pumped up once or twice in a whole season. They weigh no more than an ordinary tire, the puncture resisting qualities being given by several layers of thin, specially prepared fabric on the tread. The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.

Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D" also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.

We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires, you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.

IF YOU NEED TIRES don't buy any kind at any price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof tires on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for our big Tire and Sundry Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.

DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it NOW.

Now comes the latest news, that Forrestal and Feyen the ditch diggers on ditch 47 are "busted." They of course collected the pay for all the work they done, then went bankrupt to beat the people out of their pay who done the labor for them. Ole Overvold a farmer living south of Sunbeam, left his farm work and hauled gasoline for them to the amount of $138.85, after they went bankrupt they invited him to put his claim into the bankrupt court, which of course meant good bye to the pay for the labor done for them. This latest rotten deal takes the cake for dirty work done on this ditch, but there will be an attempt made to recover from the bonding company.

Watered Talk.

Probably there is nothing under the sun which is the basis of so large a number of figures of speech as water.

A poor argument "won't hold water;" a babbler is "a leaky vessel;" a half drunken man is "half seas over;" "fishing in troubled waters" is another name for getting into difficulty; "still waters run deep" is a hint that your quiet and demure person has more in him than the world supposes; if a man is in a bad predicament he is in "hot water;" disappointment is "a wet blanket."

Of the rejected suitor it is said that "cold water is thrown on his hopes;" the hungry man's "mouth waters;" the strengthless are "weak as water;" sometimes it "rains blessings;" when an orator begins to be tedious we say he has "run dry;" news is always "afloat;" speculators are often "swamped;" many people find it impossible to "keep their heads above water," and often we have to acknowledge that we are "all at sea."

Prizes For Corn.

Over $2000 worth of premiums and cash prizes will be distributed at the Third Annual Farm Crops Show at Crookston. February 10-20, 1914. A cement stave silo will be given for the best 10 ears of corn. A second silo is in prospect for the best 30 ears of corn grown in N.W. Minnesota. The premium list will be ready soon. All the counties of N. W. Minnesota should get together to make this the biggest exhibit of grains, corn, potatoes, clover, and alfalfa ever arranged in the state. The liberal prizes are worth your efforts. Such an exhibit can make the entire state sit and take notice. A committee should be named in each county to push this Show. The samples must be in by February 12. For a copy of the premium list, address, Secretary, Farm Crops Show, Crookston. Minn.

LIQUOR LAWS AND OFFICIALS.

(Roseau Times.)

Samuel G. Iverson, candidate for governor, declares for the enforcement of the liquor laws and the removal of officials who fail to perform the duties enjoined upon them by the laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors. After all it is the man, the man and his record, that the people should judge worthy of their votes. We mean those citizens who stand for good government. It must be expected that the liquor element and big interests, the one to destroy and the other to rob, are for good government provided it does not interfere with their business, and we or men who are in sympathy with or who represent interests detrimental to good government and the health, morality and welfare of the people are not honest men and should not be preferred for public office.

MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

THE FARMERS RAILWAY.

CHEAP AND RELIABLE TRANSPORTATION FOR ALL PRODUCTS OF THIS TERRITORY.

The Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway Company has commenced the construction of the first division of 20 miles running eastward from Thief River Falls to the Township of Goodridge

The company expects to put this 20 miles in operation not later than the First Day of September, 1914 Extensions from the end of the First Division will then be started and placed in operation as soon as possible.

This railway will afford to the farmers of this district the very best of railway service for transporting their products to market. Arrangements have already been made so that it will be possible to load cars at the stations of the Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway and ship these same cars without reloading to any point on any railroad in the United States, without any additional switching or transfer charges. For instance, in accordance with the rate as laid down at the present time by the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of the State of Minnesota, you can ship a carload of 600 bushels of wheat from Gryla to Duluth for only $2 16 more than from Thief River Falls to Duluth.

THE MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RAILWAY WILL BRING THE VERY BEST OF MARKETS IT WILL INCREASE THE VALUE OF EVERY ACRE OF LAND IN THIS COMMUNITY. IT WILL MAKE FARMING HERE AS PROFITABLE AS IN ANY PART OF THE UNITED STATES.

Every land owner in this community should exert himself, to secure this railway and should subscribe for at least one share of stock. The Company asks for no bonus. The stock will pay you a good rate of interest and prove a good investment. You can secure this railway in your immediate vicinity sooner by subscribing for some stock now.

IS IDEAL CANDIDATE.

(Madison Independent Press.)

State Auditor Iverson has announced himself as a candidate for governor. He is an ideal man, a capable state auditor and would make an able governor.

WILL RECEIVE PEOPLE'S SUPPORT.

(Young America Eagle.)

State Auditor Samuel G. Iverson has announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination for governor, in announcing his candidacy he states that he is for intelligent economy in public affairs and advocates the cutting out of every needless public expense, thereby reducing taxation; the protection of public health; the enforcement of existing laws; the developing of natural resources; to better conditions of the working classes, and to place all state departments under civil service laws. Mr. Iverson's announcement has the right ring and his candidacy will receive the support of the people, regardless of the politicians.

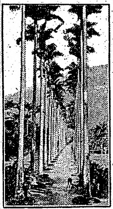
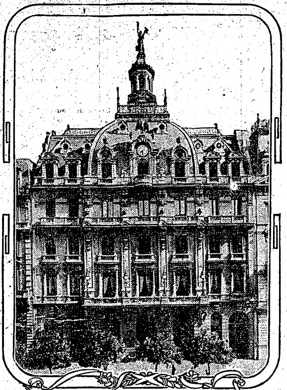
WHERE AN AMERICAN ENGINEER LIVES



BOTANICAL GARDENS AT RIO DE JANEIRO



LA PRENSA BUILDING BUENOS AIRES

LAGUNA DEL INCA, ANDES

IF you crave the unusual it may be encountered in South America as in few other lands. But before visiting that part of the world make sure you are well supplied with money and in a mood to put up with more or less discomfort and inconvenience; for the exceptional will be your portion in this line as well as in others," says Frederic S. Isham, author and globe trotter, in the Detroit Free Press.

"South America is a land of magnificent distances, also of surprises, some of which are not exactly welcome, although on the whole it is a very interesting part of the world," said Mr. Isham, recounting some of the experiences that befell them on the trip. "You are constantly running on to the unexpected, so that there is no danger of being wearied by lack of variety.

"We met one man who has the most trying position of which I know. He's an American—a big, broad shouldered, athletic chap, with the polish of a university man and the breezy open-hearted manner of a true westerner.

"He is an engineer, and it is his duty to see that the Chilean division of the Trans-Andean railroad is kept free from land and snow slides.

"That doesn't sound so bad, does it, because you can have no conception of what it means unless you have seen the country. The Trans-Andean railroad is a third-rail system in the strictest sense of the word. That third rail is located between the narrow gauge strips of steel on which the cars travel, and is a cogged affair into which teeth on the driving wheels of the locomotive slip, giving sufficient grip to pull the heavy trains up the almost perpendicular course.

"On the Chilean side of the Andes it is a case of climbing almost every foot of the way, and at times it seems as though the locomotive must fall backward on the cars that follow.

"This chap lives in a little stone house close by Inca lake, in the Andes, 12,000 feet above sea level. He has a gang of natives under him, and at certain seasons of the year they are kept on the jump battling with snow slides, which bury the tracks so deep that it requires days of the hardest kind of work to clear them.

"Then the mountains have a playful habit of casting off a good big slice of rock and dirt, which comes tumbling down across the tracks and puts an end to travel until it has been removed.

"Sometimes these pranks result seriously, and there's many a lonely grave along the right of way to indicate the last resting place of some poor section man who was buried beneath a slide. Last winter a few square acres of snow and rock and ice came crashing down on a crew that were endeavoring to clear the tracks. Part of them escaped untouched and immediately began digging out their fellow workers. At the end of 26 hours they came upon a sorry figure—a battered section man who had borne the full brunt of the slide.

"And what do you think he did when they pulled him out, more dead than alive? Berated them for leaving him buried so long.

"'You're a fine lot,' he stormed, 'why, you left me in there two hours. It wasn't your fault that I didn't die.'

"And the hands on the clock had started on their third round trip since the slide went over him!

"The place this engineer calls home is one of the most Godforsaken spots I ever saw. They try to keep the road open the year round, but there are three of four months every winter when trains are few and far between, and the district is virtually cut off from the outside world.

"The scenery along the route is impressive—but somehow I didn't envy this particular American his job.

"Crossing the crest of the Andes and getting down to the Argentine plains you strike one of the widest gauge railroads in the world. Service on the line is not so bad—in some respects.

"They have single and double compartment cars for male and female passengers. It was my ill fortune to draw a seat in a double compartment with three Spaniards. Now, they are not exactly the traveling companions you would select for a 24-hour ride across the plains, a journey that is trying under the most favorable conditions.

"They are passionately fond of onions of a particularly rank variety. Without exception they smoke cigarettes that make burning rubber reminiscent of attar of roses. Most of them are affected with bronchial trouble. They detest fresh air. Also they never have acquired a liking for a cold plunge before breakfast—or a bath any other time, for that matter. When I was ready to enter the train three of the most disreputable representatives of their species were settled comfortably in the compartment. Delightful prospect.

"Just about that time I had the good fortune to run into an American engineer who was on his way to Buenos Aires. He had the same luck as I—three of the unwashed in his compartment. Fortunately he was able to talk some Spanish.

"'Let's bribe the guard and see if we can't get a compartment to ourselves,' I suggested.

"No sooner said than tried. Presently my new-found friend came back. We had with our train a virtuous guard. Offered five dollars to effect the desired change, he spurned the tender with a fine display of indignation. He could not be hired—for such a paltry sum. But for ten dollars he would throw the dirty rascals out, bag and baggage.

"Gladly I contributed the other half of the bribe. Soon baggage began to fly out on the platform, followed by a jabbering trio, who made the Argentine air blue with picturesque profanity as they protested against this summary ejectment.

"They produced tickets to show they were entitled to seats in this particular compartment. The guard, in his most imperious manner, informed them that he cared not what their tickets called for. Did not he have the official chart of the train? And did it not show that this particular compartment belonged to the two distinguished American travelers? Out with such dogs as they. And out they went.

"I never learned what became of them. The next morning when we left the train at Buenos Aires three ugly looking Spaniards glared at us as they trudged by with their baggage—but we cared not. All the way across the plains we had a compartment to ourselves, a double portion of bedding and every attention that the guard could bestow upon us.

"Even then there was sufficient discomfort. The rain came down in torrents throughout the entire trip. The roofs to the coaches leaked like a sieve, and some of the passengers who were fortunate enough to possess such an article found it expedient to sit under an umbrella. The dining car had a couple of inches of water on the floor and we found it necessary to wear rubbers when going in to our meals.

"Buenos Aires is an interesting seaport, with a wonderful waterfront and dock system. However, it is in some respects one of the deadest places imaginable.

"No respectable woman of the country is to be found in the innumerable cafes of an evening, for the reason that she would not be safe from insult. The only place of amusement where the young women of the city can go is the opera house, and this has only a brief season.

"As an example of up-to-date construction and equipment the railroad which runs from Santos to Sao Paulo, in Brazil, commands attention. It is doubtful if there is anything more complete anywhere on earth. The road is only 25 miles long, but so far as I could discover the only thing they overlooked in their endeavors to outstrip all others was to gild the telegraph poles and to use gold wires.

"The road impressed me so that I made some inquiries, and discovered the reason for this lavish expenditure. It seems that one of the terms under which the concession was granted was that all profits above 8 per cent. were to go to the government.

"So far as I could discover there had been no appreciable decrease in the national debt from the government's share of the profits. It makes vast sums of money—but everything above the stipulated 8 per cent. goes back into the enterprise.

"Evidently spending these earning so they will not fall into the hands of the government is a strenuous job and calls for no little ingenuity. There are gutters alongside the tracks to carry off the water. These are paved with small sections of stone, laid with mosaic precision. This feature alone, wholly unnecessary, must have cost a vast amount. And everything else is on the same extravagant scale.

"To crowd more thrills into a given length of time than you would have thought possible it is only necessary to hire a taxicab in Rio Janeiro. Here dare devilism finds its highest expression in the way the drivers of motor cars tear around.

"The drivers have a union of their own and they dictate things to suit themselves. Whenever one of them hits a pedestrian he throws on more power and races off, never waiting to see whether or not he killed his victim. And they hit them with frightful frequency. Every day the newspapers publish a brief summary of accidents of this nature, and I should say the average was around 20."

CO-OPERATION IN BIBLE TIMES

In common with many of the prophets of Bible times, Ahijah, the man who placed Jereboam over the ten tribes of Israel, was a rural man, W. A. Lippincott writes in the Kansas Industrialist. Elijah, who outwitted the brilliant and scheming Queen Jezebel, went about preaching in his shepherd's mantel and carrying the shepherd's staff, as though proud of his country origin. Of Elisha, his successor, we are told that at the time when Elijah offered him a job as his helper he was plowing with 12 yoke of oxen. The fact that this is recorded we would interpret to mean that he was considered a skillful teamster.

When Saul first comes to our attention in the Old Testament, he was out on the range looking for his father's asses that had broken away from the picket or escaped the wrangler. Later we find him coming after the herd out of the field. David was a red headed farm boy called from his keeping the sheep to have Judge Samuel pass compliments upon him to his father and point out the great possibilities he saw in the boy.

The problems which confronted the people of the Old Testament and the questions involved in current legislation have just as modern a ring as has the eminent and great. One of the problems which they had solved and which we have not was that of co-operation among farmers. Another was the question of concentration in the ownership of land with its attendant evil, the absentee landlord.

You will not find the the subject of co-operation discussed as such in the Old Testament, perhaps, but you will find it put into practice.

So far as can be learned, there were no isolated farm houses where single families lived alone. As a general thing, a number of more or less related families united in forming a rural village. These were not cities in any sense, nor even small towns, but little hamlets set in the midst of the fields and hills. The country districts were dotted with these tiny villages, and we find constant reference to them throughout the Old and New Testaments.

Every morning the men went out to the fields to work and at night they came back to the village for shelter.

The reason for this gathering into villages was that the farmers were under the necessity of co-operating against the attacks of enemies from the desert and the surrounding countries. They co-operated just as the sturdy pioneers of our own early colonial days co-operated in the use of the stockade—because they had to. And the trend of the times seems to be that the farmers of today are co-operating more and more for the same reason—because they find they have to.

It's a case of self-preservation now as much as it was in Bible or early colonial times. The enemy is not the same, save in the characteristic of being a common enemy. Then the necessity was military; now it is economic and social, but it is just as real.

And there are those who have studied this question deeply, who feel very certain that the time will come when the American farmers will again be gathered into farm villages, as the farmers of Germany have already gathered, under the pressure of economic necessity and as a part of a broad program of co-operation.

HERE'S THE SIMPLE LIFE.

The south for years was rich hunting ground for the lover of the picturesque, but changes both numerous and rapid have occurred there in recent years. The old negro types of the cotton fields are no more. The log cabins, the pine groves, even the stately plantation mansions, recalling the flowery days of "befo' de wah," are passing away. Fortunately for those who enjoy seeing life as it is lived where there is a real attachment to the soil, the French section of Canada is left us. Here along the lower St. Lawrence river one may find conditions exactly as they were a century ago. Here the "one-hoss shay," the pride of colonial days, is making its last stand. In the fields women may be seen cutting grain with sickles than which there is no implement more primitive. The people of the hamlets live and work as did their great grandparents. Picture to yourself a place where spinning is still an everyday task! I have sat in these simple homes, watching deft fingers at the spinning wheels and listening to their whirring sound that is like the hum or bees. It was in one of these old interiors that I photographed Grand'mere Trudeau. She sits looking from her cabin across the river, thinking of a son at sea.—Christian Herald.

ALBERTA CROP YIELDS

At MacLeod, Alta., weather conditions were excellent all through the season. Ninety per cent. of the wheat up to Oct. 1st graded No. 1, the only No. 2 being fall wheat. The yield ranged from 20 to 40 bushels per acre, with an average of 28. Oats yielded well, and barley about 60 bushels.

Inverary is a new district in Alberta. Here wheat graded No. 2 and some of it went 50 bushels to the acre, oats going about 75 bushels.

Lethbridge correspondent says: "In the Monarch district the yield on summer fallow is averaging thirty-five bushels, a large percentage No. 1 northern."

"All spring grains are yielding better than expected in the Milk river district, south. A 300 acre field of Marquis wheat gave 41½ bushels.

"Experimental farm results on grain sown on irrigated land place 'Red Fife' wheat in the banner position, with a yield of 59.40 bushels per acre. Oats yielded 132 bushels to the acre.

"John Turner of Lethbridge grew barley that went 60 bushels to the acre.

"Red Fife averages in weight from 60 to 68 pounds, and at Rosthern the Marquis wheat will run as high as 64 pounds to the bushel, while a sample of Marquis wheat at Arcola weighed no less than 68 pounds to the bushel. This variety is grading No. 1 hard."

Calgary, Alta., Oct. 8.—The problem of handling Alberta's big grain crop is becoming a serious one, and there is a congestion at many points in southern Alberta. One thousand cars could be used immediately. The C. P. R. prepared for a normal year, while the yield of grain was everywhere abnormal, with an increased acreage of about 23 per cent.

Moose Jaw, Sask., returns show some remarkable yields.

Bassano, Alta., Sept. 25, '13.—Individual record crops grown in Alberta include 1,300 acre field of spring wheat grown near Bassano which went thirty-five bushels to the acre and weighed sixty-six pounds to the bushel.

Noble, Alta., Oct. 1, '13.—All records for the largest shipment of grain by one farmer will be broken this year if the estimate of C. S. Noble of Noble, Alberta, proves correct. Mr. Noble has notified the Canadian Pacific Railway here that he will have 350,000 bushels of grain, chiefly barley and oats, ready for shipment very shortly.

L. Anderson Smith, writing to a friend in the Old Country, located at Killam, Alberta, Says:

"Anyone taking up land will find Alberta an ideal province. The soil is a rich black loam, varying from 6 to 12 inches in depth. The land here in this district is not wholly open prairie. At intervals, sometimes closely, sometimes widely scattered, there are small plots of poplar and willows. These generally grow round some small depression in the land, and the snow drifts here in the winter and melts in the spring filling these sloughs (province "slews") with soft water. Nearly all these sloughs have old buffalo tracks to them, for it was from them that they always got their water. The poplars are very useful for building barns and hen-houses. Wild grasses are plentiful, while tame grasses, such as timothy, brome and western rye grass do remarkably well.

Rheumatism Is Torture

Many pains that pass as rheumatism are due to weak kidneys—to the failure of the kidneys to drive off uric acid thoroughly.

When you suffer achy, bad joints, backache too, dizziness and some urinary disturbances, get Doan's Kidney Pills, the remedy that is recommended by over 150,000 people in many different lands.

Doan's Kidney Pills help weak kidneys to drive out the uric acid which is the cause of backache, rheumatism and lumbago.

Here's proof.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

PREUS ASKS FOR INSURANCE LAWS

STATE COMMISSIONER SHOWS SOME INJUSTICES IN PRESENT STATE RATES.

GIVES INTERESTING FIGURES

Annual Report Has Statistics for Entire State With Apparent Discriminations Which Should Be Remedied.

St. Paul.—State Insurance Commissioner J. A. O. Preus is advocating that the commissioner of insurance be authorized by legislation to pass upon all insurance rates made by the state rating bureau, thus enabling any community or individual, who is not getting a fair rate, to get relief from a public official. He calls attention, in his annual report, to the fact that during the past 20 years the large cities have had a loss ratio of 60 per cent, all other fire department towns 55 per cent, and the balance of the state 39 per cent. The loss ratio has been 20 per cent higher in Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth than it has in unprotected portions of the state. Mr. Preus feels that this is a gross discrimination in favor of the large cities and against the smaller towns and farming communities, and that the right way to correct the situation is to authorize the insurance commissioner to raise or lower rates and remove discriminations where existing.

J. A. O. PREUS
State Insurance Commissioner.

That the country is being discriminated against is also evidenced by the fact that during the past 34 years the township mutual fire insurance companies of the state have furnished to policyholders insurance on an average of 15 cents per hundred, while the stock companies have charged on an average of 60 cents a hundred in the southern part of the state and 70 cents a hundred in the northern part of the state.

DRUG SMUGGLING IS DENIED

Man Under Indictment for Carrying Morphine to Prison Convicts Offers an Alibi.

Stillwater.—Frank Chessman, who is now under indictment for carrying morphine into the state prison, was permitted to testify at the habeas corpus proceedings before Court Commissioner Lee here. He declared that he did not commit the crime, that it must have been another Frank Chessman, and that he was in New York from October 8 until brought back by the sheriff December 11.

The commissioner denied the motion of County Attorney Thoreen, who appeared for Sheriff Jarchow, to dismiss on the grounds that a court commissioner has no authority to hear such petition in case of an indictment and had no authority to accept evidence that is in defense and should be presented at the trial upon the indictment. The attorneys were given time to file briefs, and the court commissioner will not decide until he has read the briefs and taken the matter under advisement.

Babe Smothers to Death.

Fergus Falls.—A message from Deer Creek states that Floyd Spore, the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Spore, smothered to death. The mother had put some extra clothing on the bed, and the child got its face covered.

$75,000 School at New Ulm.

New Ulm.—At a special meeting of the board of education plans for a $75,000 high school building were approved. Work on the new structure is to be commenced in the spring. New Ulm will be the pioneer in adopting the indoor fire escape plan in its schools, the new high school to be the first in the state so equipped. The building will have a frontage of 154 feet with an extreme depth of 130 feet, fully equipped with gymnasium, recitation rooms, laboratories, study hall and library.

BEMIDJI TO VOTE ON SALOONS

Question of Abolishment Will Be Up for First Time Feb. 17.

Bemidji.—At the regular city election on Feb. 17, Bemidji, for the first time in its history, will vote on the question of wiping out the saloons.

Under the provisions of a bill enacted by the legislature a year ago, cities of the fourth class may, upon petition of 10 per cent of the voters, vote upon the saloon issue at a regular election. Petitions have been signed by more than the required percentage.

Shortly after the new council was seated last spring, the saloon license was raised from $500 to $1,000 and saloonkeepers were notified that the number of saloons would be reduced whenever, in the judgment of the council, a license should be refused until the number would be cut to sixteen.

Since that time five saloons have been put out of business, leaving 29 still in existence, 13 over the mark.

Next in interest to this issue is the apparent determination of the voters to slaughter any candidate who wears the brand of socialism.

GRAND RAPIDS SEEKS ROAD

Commercial Club Will Bid For Terminus of Duluth, Missabe & Northern.

Grand Rapids.—The commercial club has again taken up the matter of interesting the Duluth, Missabe & Northern railway in the extension of its lines from the terminus at Coleraine to this point. The distance is only 80 miles and the new townsite of Fayton, near which are the mining operations of the Inter-State Iron company, is directly between the two towns.

Statistics showing the probable traffic to be derived through the extension are to be presented to the officials of the road and it is thought the proposition will meet with a cordial reception, it being understood in this section that the road management has long considered this point as a western terminus.

Persons connected with the Messaba Electric railway have been in this neighborhood often of late and it is rumored it is the intention to extend that line westward as far as Biwabik in the spring, continuing it to this point at a later date.

WOULD UNITE ON OPPONENT

Gubernatorial Candidate Has Plan for Compact Opposition to Eberhart.

Minneapolis.—William E. Lee of Long Prairie has publicly offered to join with other candidates for governor in an effort to eliminate all but one opponent of Governor A. O. Eberhart. The offer was made in a signed statement, putting the proposition up to the other aspirants who have announced themselves. Mr. Lee says that he will:

Name a representative to meet with representatives of other candidates to agree on a candidate;

Meet with the other candidates and vote until one is selected to make the run, no candidate voting for himself;

Submit the question to a conference or convention, constituted so as to have public confidence,

Or agree to eliminate all the candidates and agree on some new man.

Well-Dressed Woman Drops Dead.

Duluth.—A stylishly dressed woman, wearing a sable coat, was found on the sidewalk on Huron street in a dying condition by C. Scannell, 2715 Huron street. The police ambulance was called, but the woman died before it reached the hospital. She has not been identified. She had taken carbolic acid, it is said. The woman apparently was about 35 years old. She was refined in appearance.

Brainerd Refuses Commission Plan.

Brainerd.—The business manager plan of commission government failed to carry in Brainerd, the vote being 448 to 594. The proposition carried in but one ward, the second. The vote on $22,000 bonds for a bridge fill carried by 940 to 147; on $75,000 bonds for a new city hall, 637 to 358; on the site for a city hall, 550 to 529.

Charter Is Almost Victorious.

Jasper.—The village of Jasper rejected the home rule charter proposition by a majority of one vote. The special election official canvass shows there were 66 votes cast in favor of the adoption of the proposed new charter while there were 67 votes cast against the proposition.

Woman Battles With Mad Dog.

Minneapolis.—A pet bulldog went mad suddenly and held Mrs. Ella Evans, her daughter, Mrs. R. M. Fraser, and Mrs. Fraser's 3-months-old twins prisoners for nearly seven hours in their home at 400 University avenue southeast. They were locked in their room, after a battle with the brute, the women in terror of their lives and unable to summon aid. They were finally rescued by policemen, who entered the house on a ladder, lassoed the dog, hanged it and shot it.

LIND MAY BECOME CANDIDATE

PREDICTED HE WILL BE DRAFTED TO RUN FOR SENATOR.

Democratic Politician Says Former Governor May Oppose Moses E. Clapp for Minnesota Toga.

Minneapolis.—John Lind can have any good political berth at the disposition of President Wilson, but he does not want any and may be pressed into the race for the United States senate against Moses E. Clapp, according to Frank A. Day, a leader of the Minnesota Democracy.

Thomas Cashman of Owatonna, author of the Cashman distance tariff act, will in all probability get into the race for the governorship and will be the choice of the Democrats, predicted Mr. Day.

"President Wilson has shown himself to be the best chief executive in the history of the nation," said Mr. Day. "The two biggest questions that have faced the country in the last 20 years—the tariff and currency problems—have been settled and in neither case are even Republicans criticizing the results.

"The administration is meeting the Mexican situation as it should. There is the most complex, crucial and delicate problem that has yet faced Wilson, and he came to Minnesota and picked her first citizen to do the job. John Lind has handled the situation like a master. He knows Mexico from coast to coast. He is a regular Mexican encyclopedia, and what Lind says goes at Washington.

"Lind could go to France as ambassador if he wanted it. He could get any embassy; he could have landed a cabinet job, but he does not want them and won't take them. But there will be a strong effort exerted to have him run for the senate. Both Washington and Minnesota may bring pressure to bear on him to make the race and if he consents, he need not do anything but file. The state would give him the toga on a silver platter."

WOLVES KILL LONE INDIAN

Red Man's Skeleton and Bodies of Nine Animals Found After Fight.

Crookston.—After having emptied his rifle and then fought desperately with his knife, killing nine wolves, the remainder of the hungry pack closed in on a lone Indian on Lake of the Woods, thirty-five miles from Warroad, near the Northwest Angle, and his bones were found stripped of every vestige of flesh. The carcasses of the dead wolves which he had killed were lying within a radius of a few rods of the Indian's skeleton.

This is the first fatality reported this winter, but it will not be the last unless extreme care is taken. This winter, the wolves are all but starved to death because of the fine weather and lack of snow. With deep snow a few wolves can easily overpower a deer floundering in deep snow while they run along on top of the crust. This winter they cannot secure a deer and only an occasional rabbit.

As a result the wolves are traveling on the lake in packs, averaging between thirty and forty. Old woodsmen state that there are more wolves this winter than have been seen for years along the Canadian boundary, and they account for the increase on the theory they have come down from the Canadian wilds.

OUTSIDE FAMILIES FLOCK IN

2,213 Come to Minnesota From Other States During 1913—2,359 Homesteads Entered.

St. Paul.—Minnesota gained 2,213 families from other states during the first eleven months of 1913, an increase of 564 families over the entire year of 1912. The figures are given by Fred D. Sherman, immigration commissioner, from the reports of the Minnesota Transfer showing the number of carloads of immigrant moveables, experience having shown that a carload of moveables represents a family.

The three federal land offices recorded 2,359 homestead entries, an increase over the previous year.

The state sold 114,931 acres at an average price of $7.38, an increase of 38 cents over the 1912 average.

More than 20,000 letters asking for information concerning Minnesota were answered and the state was advertised by an exhibit car by displays at the Illinois and Indiana fairs and advertisements in sixty farm papers and magazines.

Dakota County Commissioners Elect.

Hastings.—At the session of the Dakota county commissioners, W. E. Beerse of Hastings was re-elected chairman and R. W. Downs of South St. Paul vice chairman. Notwithstanding that J. J. Gergen of Vermillion was chosen commissioner from the fourth district to succeed G. S. Balch, whose election was regarded as illegal by the attorney general, the latter (Balch) will continue to serve until a hearing upon a quo warranto writ is had by Judge Albert Johnson of Red Wing.

2,800 MEXICANS ARE PRISONERS IN U. S.

1,500 CIVILIANS ALSO HELD AT PRESIDIO, TEXAS—COWARDICE LOST STRUGGLE.

NOT ENOUGH AMMUNITION

This Given as Cause of Evacuation of Town to Rebels—Scenes of Disorder on Both Sides of Border.

Presidio, Texas, Jan. 13.—Six Mexican federal generals and 2,800 soldiers are prisoners on United States soil here following the disastrous rout of the Federal forces at Ojinaga, and urgent request for the removal of these troops as well as of 1,500 civilian refugees who accompanied the soldiers in their flight from the Mexican town, have been sent to the war department through Brigadier General Bliss.

Distress Is Intense.

Hungry, cold, without shelter, these 4,300 soldiers and civilians, men, women and children, are packed in a corral covering several acres, together with dogs, chickens and cattle. Their distress is intense.

Two cannon, four large field pieces, and 200,000 rounds of ammunition which were brought to the American side by the Mexican soldiers when they abandoned the town across the border to General Francisco Villa's rebel forces, are also in the custody of the United States troops under Major McNamee.

Other results of the rebel successes, which placed General Villa's army in undisputed control of a vast section of northern Mexico are: Federal Generals Mercado, Castro, Orpinal, Remero, Aduno and Landa are in custody of the United States troops awaiting their disposition by the war department.

Escape Along Border.

General Pascual Orozco and General Ynez Salazar, federal volunteer commanders, escaped along the border to some point remote from Presidio. Salazar was wounded. They were accompanied by General Caraveo and General Rojas and 300 cavalrymen. Salazar and Orozco are being watched for in the United States on indictments charging them with violating the neutrality laws.

General Landa said he was certain all the federal generals escaped the rebels.

Charges of cowardice were made against Orozco, Salazar and Rojas. General Mercado said these generals abandoned their troops at the beginning of the battle and thus weakened the federal defense.

Lack of Ammunition.

General Mercado reiterated that the federals were compelled to evacuate because of lack of ammunition. He said at the retreat his soldiers had an average of only 78 cartridges.

Camped in Ojinaga, for the possession of which he had been fighting less than 24 hours previously, General Villa started the work of establishing rebel government. He telegraphed to General Carranza:

"I have proved my ability to capture Ojinaga."

After the confusion incident to the evacuation of Ojinaga by one army and its occupation by another, the battlefield opposite Presidio revealed a scene of desolation.

The whole sweep of land leading to the heights of Ojinaga appeared to have been ploughed up by the frantic rout of the federal army and the eager scramble into the village of General Villa's rebels.

Reminders of Battle.

There were many living reminders of the battle. Those who went across in behalf of the Red Cross found many wounded who had remained for hours uncared for. They were sometimes traced in the trenches by their groans. It was the belief of the American army physicians that many soldiers died because neither federals nor rebels had a hospital corps.

The scene of disorder was almost as bad on the American side as on the Mexican.

George W. Peckham Dies.

Milwaukee, Wis., Jan. 13.—George W. Peckham, nationally known as an educator, author and entomologist, died at his home here, after a brief illness, aged 68 years. He has served as city high school superintendent, city librarian, and has written many books on entomology and pedagogy.

"Canal Open July 1"—Goethals.

Long Beach, Cal., Jan. 13.—The Panama canal will be in use for commercial vessels July 1, 1914, according to a telegram Captain Robert Dollar of San Francisco, president of a steamship company, announced he had received from Colonel Goethals.

Missouri Judge Is Removed.

Brookfield, Mo., Jan. 13.—Judge John L. Wilkerson was ousted from the Linn county court by a decision of the circuit court, given at Linneus and received here. Judge Eugene Sturtevant, Wilkerson's associate, was reprimanded. It was held that he was but the tool of Judge Wilkerson. Both judges were charged with violating the law in deals between themselves as individuals and the county court of which they were a part in buying and selling livestock, feed and building materials for public use.

Women Everywhere

Praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Women from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from all sections of this great country, no city so large, no village so small but that some woman has written words of thanks for health restored by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. No woman who is suffering from the ills peculiar to her sex should rest until she has given this famous remedy a trial. Is it not reasonable to believe that what it did for these women it will do for any sick woman?

Wonderful Case of Mrs. Stephenson, on the Pacific Coast.

INDEPENDENCE, OREGON.—"I was sick with what four doctors called Nervous Prostration, was treated by them for several years, would be better for a while then back in the old way again. I had palpitation of the heart very bad, fainting spells, and was so nervous that a spoon dropping to the floor would nearly kill me, could not lift the lightest weight without making me sick; in fact was about as sick and miserable as a person could be. I saw your medicines advertised and thought I would try them, and am so thankful I did for they helped me at once. I took about a dozen bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and also used the Sanative Wash. Since then I have used them whenever I felt sick. Your remedies are the only doctor I employ. You are at liberty to publish this letter."—Mrs. W. STEPHENSON, Independence, Oregon.

A Grateful Atlantic Coast Woman.

HODGDON, ME.—"I feel it a duty I owe to all suffering women to tell what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did for me. One year ago I found myself a terrible sufferer. I had pains in both sides and such a soreness I could scarcely straighten up at times. My back ached, I had no appetite and was so nervous I could not sleep, then I would be so tired mornings that I could scarcely get around. It seemed almost impossible to move or do a bit of work and I thought I never would be any better until I submitted to an operation. I commenced taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and soon felt like a new woman. I had no pains, slept well, had good appetite and was fat and could do almost all my own work for a family of four. I shall always feel that I owe my good health to your medicine."—Mrs. HAYWARD SOWERS, Hodgdon, Maine.

For 30 years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been the standard remedy for female ills. No one sick with woman's ailments does justice to herself if she does not try this famous medicine made from roots and herbs, it has restored so many suffering women to health.

Write to LYDIA E. PINKHAM MEDICINE CO. (CONFIDENTIAL) LYNN, MASS., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

ELDER'S STRICT AS TO DUTY

Observance of the Sabbath Most Rigidly Enforced in Scotland in the Sixteenth Century.

The sixteenth century practice of the elders in Scotland of going the rounds to pick up offenders against Sunday rules survived until the eighteenth century. Mr. Thoman, in his "Weavers' Craft," gives details of the "bag;" "The minister himself would make the rounds to spy with his own eyes the sins of the absentees. Here one man is found romping with his bairns; another detected kissing his wife; two men were found drinking ale, and one was found with his coat off, as if he were going to work; and still another was seen eating a hearty dinner. All were pulled up before the session of the kirk and 'repentances' enforced upon each." And now one can understand the wherefore of the drawn blind on the Sabbath, which struck James Payn as astonishing in the Edinburgh of the sixties.

Bad Air.

"Don't you notice how bad the air is in this car?" asked the fussy old lady of the railroad conductor.

"Yes, I do," replied the polite official, "I guess the last time they filled the airbrakes they got a bad lot of air."

Unknown Quantity.

"Darling, do you love me still?"

"Dearest, I never knew you were still."

SKIN CLEARED.

By Simple Change in Food.

It has been said by a physician that most diseases are the result of indigestion.

There's undoubtedly much truth in the statement, even to the cause of many unsightly eruptions, which many suppose can be removed by applying some remedy on the outside.

By changing her food a Kan. girl was relieved of an eczema which was a great annoyance to her. She writes:

"For five months I was suffering with an eruption on my face and hands which our doctor called eczema and which caused me a great deal of inconvenience. The suffering was almost unbearable.

"The medicine I took only gave me temporary relief. One day I happened to read somewhere that eczema was caused by indigestion. Then I read that many persons had been relieved of indigestion by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I decided to try it. I liked the taste of the food and was particularly pleased to notice that my digestion was improving and that the eruption was disappearing as if by magic. I had at last found, in this great food, something that reached my trouble.

"When I find a victim of this affliction I remember my own former suffering and advise a trial of Grape-Nuts food instead of medicines."

ECZEMA IN WATER BLISTERS

748 Congress St., Chicago, Ill.—"My eczema broke out like little water blisters. Each one was full of water and would itch until I would scratch it open, then the water would run out and it would get sore. I first got the eczema on the back of the hand and I scratched it so hard I made it all sore. Then I got it on my legs just above the ankle and above the knee.

"I used what they call ——— and it stopped the itch but it got worse. Then I used ———. In all I had the trouble for about two years. One day I saw the advertisement of Cuticura Soap and Ointment in the paper. I wrote for a sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment and I tried them and then bought some more. Cuticura Soap and Ointment left my sores nice and smooth. I used them for six weeks, and am now cured; the eczema left no marks." (Signed) F. W. Horrisch, Oct. 19, 1912.

35 BUSHELS PER ACRE was the yield of WHEAT

on many farms in Western Canada in 1913, some yields being reported as high as 50 bushels per acre. As high as 100 bushels were recorded in some districts for oats, 50 bushels for barley and from 10 to 20 bus. for flax.

J. Keys arrived in the country 5 years ago from Denmark with very little means. He homesteaded, worked hard, is now the owner of 320 acres of land, in 1913 had a crop of 200 acres, which will realize him about $4,000. His wheat weighed 68 lbs. to the bushel and averaged over 35 bushels to the acre.

Thousands of similar instances might be related of the homesteaders in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The crop of 1913 was an abundant one everywhere in Western Canada.

The Stolen Submarine

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

Nikolai and I had gone to Kiel to attend the German yacht races. Such meetings are, of course, largely patronized by gentlemen who dabble in what Nikolai called "high finance." The police had gathered in a score and more of the fraternity and sent them out of the country; but those were the bunglers at their trade. We passed as wealthy Americans, and hoped to reap a harvest.

But my companion's thoughts flew high above the common swindling. I knew that when he announced his coup, it would be something worthy of his fantastic mind. On the third evening, while we sat together upon the esplanade, watching the yachts swing past, flags of all nations fluttering at the mast heads, Nikolai broached his plan.

"These Germans are giving England a hard fight for the supremacy of the ocean," he said, as the kaiser's yacht, having defeated her English antagonist, passed to the salutation of ten thousand throats. "And they're not so far behind in actual war material either. England would give a fortune for the plans of the new German submarine."

He handed me the Daily Telegraph of two days previous, which he had purchased at the Casino. I had not seen a paper for the past week. Turning to the column indicated by my companion, I discovered that the German war scare had assumed a new phase.

The column, which was headed in black type, dealt with the maneuvers of a mysterious submarine ship, which had been seen at various points along the British coast, sometimes as a half-submerged body that cut through the water at an astonishing speed, at others merely as the periscope; the eye of such craft, which alone was visible above the waves. It was obviously engaged in taking soundings and spying upon the English naval defenses.

"From these various statements of those who have seen this craft," the newspaper went on to say, "it is evident, in spite of official denials, that it is none other than the new German submarine, about which so much speculation is rife. Its ability to travel such a distance from its base demonstrates the fact clearly, for no other type of submarine vessel has more than a very limited sphere of action. The British government would, doubtless, pay handsomely for a plan of this craft. Meanwhile it is reported that warships are searching for it—and, Messieurs, if you come within the limits of our territorial waters, look out for a broadside!"

"'The British government would, doubtless, pay handsomely for a plan of this craft,'" Nikolai quoted, reading over my shoulder. "Well, why shouldn't we earn the reward, Summers?"

"How could we get the plans?" I asked.

"We won't," replied Nikolai. "What do you say to taking the craft itself and steering it into Portsmouth harbor? It might be piracy on the high seas, but—would England let it go before she had inspected it? And the reward would be big.

"You have never seen a submarine of the newer type, Summers," Nikolai went on hastily, before I could interpose any objection. "Within those shells one man, and certainly two, can hold the entire crew at bay. How? Well, a stick of dynamite, retained in proximity to the steering gear, is a powerful aid. There are few sailors who would choose certain death by suffocation at the bottom of the sea in preference to life with a modicum of dishonor. Then, again, they keep no arms except a couple of pistols or so. A submarine is not an offensive craft. One man, in fact, could easily overpower the entire crew.

"Now, Summers, once we are aboard, this shall be your task. Meanwhile, I shall assume charge of the steering apparatus and bring the vessel safely into Portsmouth harbor. There we deliver her to the authorities. All are arrested and detained pending the court's decision. In the end the vessel is released, we are condemned to hang for piracy—and somebody opens our cell doors one night and a grateful government pensions us. Do you understand?"

"It's risky," I suggested.

"But it's sure," said Nickolai. "And the audacity of the scheme makes its fulfillment easy."

In fact, the initial steps at any rate, proved no formidable obstacle. We knew that the Kiel naval yards must be the headquarters of the mysterious craft. There was no difficulty in discovering the slip at which she berthed after each return from the English coast. The streets were full of German sailors; discipline, never so drastic in the navy as in the army, was a trifle lax during the regatta week; there was no difficulty in gaining admittance to the slip.

Nikolai, in the uniform of a naval captain, and I, attired as his orderly, did, in fact, penetrate the dockyard many times during the ensuing week. We soon discovered that the Hertha, as the submarine was called, set forth twice each week, for her explorations of the North sea, returning to dock at three-day intervals to replenish her fuel. The crew consisted of picked men, veterans of the service, who were commanded by the same officer on each occasion. So much we learned—or rather, Nikolai learned—during these nightly visits of ours. Nikolai spoke German as his mother tongue, and even naval officers grow garrulous after the fourth bottle.

But as to the mechanism of the Hertha, or its objects in the periodical journeys, nobody could say. Our investigation must be made personally.

It was on Thursday, June 29, that we laid our final plans. The Hertha had docked; judging by precedent, she would set forth upon the following evening. The approach to the slip was guarded by a couple of marines, who were relieved periodically; but we had discovered where Lieut. Von Beeman lived, and believed it would be easy to gain admittance. We were to wait in the proximity of his house until he left on the following evening to take up his command. We would follow close upon his heels and pass in a short distance behind him; under the circumstances it would be improbable that the marines would question us. But to ensure against any unexpected circumstances, Nikolai had a forged paper from the ministry of marine, detailing him, with his orderly—myself—to accompany Von Beeman upon his next journey.

I confess I was trembling when, on the ensuing evening, we put this scheme into execution. It must have been in the evening, just when the long twilight was yielding to night, before we perceived the lieutenant leave his quarters and stride sharply down the street. We followed him, gradually edging up closer. At a short distance from the entrance to the slip he swung round on his heel.

"Halt!" he cried sharply, seeing our uniforms and thinking us sailors. "What the devil are you men doing here? What ship are you from?"

But that it was nearly dark I could have sworn Nikolai grew purple in the face from feigned wrath.

"Attention, sir," he bawled. "I am Captain Von Obermeister of the ministry of marine." I saw the lieutenant bring his heels together with a click; he stood stiff as a ramrod and his hand went up to the salute mechanically. Nikolai sputtered and stormed inarticulately for a few moments.

"Schmidt!" he cried to me at length, "withdraw seventeen paces in accordance with the regulations."

I understood only the motion of the hand. But Nikolai explained to me subsequently that this was the formula prescribed in the case of an officer intending to admonish a subordinate. According to the rules of the service, no officer might rebuke another in the presence of an enlisted man.

Hardly had I withdrawn when I saw Nikolai leap toward the lieutenant and metaphorically rend him. His voice, a continuous low basso, was hardly punctuated by the lieutenant's high-pitched apologies. Von Beeman was limp and actually trembling when Nikolai, having concluded his lecture, recalled me. "My orderly, Schmidt, accompanies me," snarled Nicolai. "You have read the order? Forward! March!"

And we passed into the slip where a long, low, oval craft was moored with ropes against a sloping dock. As we approached, a half dozen sailors rose and stood at attention.

"Will you step aboard, sir?" asked the lieutenant with deference. Nikolai accepted the invitation; I followed him; then came the lieutenant, the sailors trooping in behind him; and soon we were all ensconced in the hollow of the ship. A few moments afterward the rope was cast off and we glided down the sloping dock into the water. Soon we were skimming the surface of the canal. Presently the waves began to rise; the lights ashore receded; a keen wind nipped our faces. I knew that we had passed into the North sea. The deck was closed and we plunged into the depths, our periscope alone visible above the waters.

The lieutenant himself stood at the steering gear, Nikolai beside him. Their gaze was bent intently upon a sort of camera obscura, very much resembling the ground glass of a photographic box, upon which were reflected the starry heavens, changing only as the ship altered her course. Three fathoms beneath the surface we could discern everything above us by the medium of this eye, which connected with a long, hollow tube, the top of which was fitted with a series of lenses and rose some feet above the water. Hence the presence of any vessel would be as discernible as though we were in an open boat.

We three were gathered together at the end of the hold. Packed closely around us was machinery of a complicated and, to me, unknown type, though I recognized a barometer, a huge compressed air tank, a gasoline tank with a series of pipes and valves, and the inevitable motor. Upon the side of the ship, close by, hung a couple of pistols, just as Nikolai had foretold. The men, stripped to the waist and perspiirng from the heat, were gathered at the opposite end, some at work upon the machinery that liberated the compressed air, one tracing the chart, others engaged upon some duties connected with the mechanism of the boat. Our voices, when we spoke, roared and re-echoed within the close confines of our quarters. I watched Nikolai, my heart beating wildly. Presently, quite casually he ran his fingers through his hair—the appointed signal. I stepped to the wall and took down the pistols; examined them casually; they were loaded. The lieutenant looked up in mild surprise.

And then it all happened. I stepped forward somewhat foolishly, and pointing the weapons at Van Beeman's face; even yet he understood nothing. He began to retreat from me, trying to speak, stunned by my demeanor. I pressed him back to the other end of the ship. The sailors had risen to their feet and stood watching me open-mouthed, Nikolai bending over the camera, apparently wholly indifferent. At that moment I seemed to be living in an unreal and grotesque dream.

The lieutenant broke the silence. "My God!" he screamed in German, "the fellow has gone mad! Captain Von Obermeister!"

Nikolai looked up. "At your service, sir," he said.

"Take his pistols away. He is insane. It is the heat!"

"Schmidt is acting under my orders," replied Nikolai. "Keep your end of the boat, lieutenant, or you die. And the first man," he added, "that stirs toward us dies. To work, men," he continued in German. The stupefied sailors obeyed.

Then Nikolai turned to the lieutenant again. "You are entitled to an explanation and you shall have it," he said. "I represent the British government, and our course is laid for Portsmouth harbor."

He spoke in English, which, like all German naval officers, the lieutenant understood perfectly. Von Beeman stared at him wildly; then suddenly he burst into sobs.

"Come, man," said Nikolai, with some sympathy, "things are not as bad as they might be. At least you can have your life. And, if you choose to expatriate yourself, rather than return to face a court-martial—there are many careers open to you—"

"Curse it, sir, I am not weeping over my disgrace," cried the lieutenant furiously. "You insulted me, sir, in the streets of Kiel, and that insult must be atoned for."

The sailors were muttering behind him. They understood the situation now. By ones and twos they left their work and mustered at his side.

"Look out!" cried Nikolai sharply. "They are going to rush us!"

He swung the wheel, and I saw the stars whirl on the silver plate beneath the Periscope. Then a faint smear of black showed itself among the leaping waves, which quickly resolved itself into a miniature warship, with fighting-tops and two long guns at the stern. A finger of light sprang from it, quivered over the sea, and remained motionless. Then from the vessel's side a tiny blur leaped into the waves.

It was a man of war. And the blur at the side was a scout motor boat. We were discovered—I realized that in an instant. Heavens be praised, the English battleship had not been searching the seas for us in vain!

If only Nikolai had waited a few brief minutes longer, until they were alongside! Now we must stand off our enemies until the rescue came. All these thoughts flashed through my brain instantaneously. My glance had hardly faltered, but that moment of indecision was enough. With a concerted movement the sailors had hurled themselves on us. The rush was so swift, so simultaneous, that the bark of my pistol was muffled in the cloth of the lieutenant's uniform, and the bullet turned aside. Then, wrapping me in his embrace, he slipped to the floor, and we tumbled and sprawled over the slippery keel-plates. The rest bore Nikolai to the ground with me, and again the stars whirled upon the silver plate as the submarine, unguided, plunged here and there under the seas.

Two minutes later we were trussed and bound and helpless. The lieutenant called off his men and stood over us, watching Nikolai with a sour smile.

"Do you know what I am going to do with you?" he asked.

"Surrender us to the German government, I hope," said Nikolai politely. "Your articles of war would not justify murder."

"I am going to wipe out the insult you offered me in the streets of Kiel," shouted Von Beeman, hoarse with passion. "You called me a sheep's head, you impostor!"

"Calf's head," said Nikolai, "not sheep's head. You shall have your satisfaction whenever you make it possible for me to meet you. The English laws against dueling are strict—"

"I am not going to England," shouted Von Beeman.

"Look at the plate!" retorted Nikolai. A sailor had sprung to the wheel. He steadied the swinging craft, and there, on the camera obscura, but filling it completely, was a scouting boat; it must have been almost upon us. Then, as I watched, I saw a flag float into the picture, and on it were the stars of the German flag.

It was a German warship, and not an English one, that had discovered us!

More and more clearly came the picture of the scouting boat. There could be no mistake. Our ruse had failed—and, when we thought that we had snatched victory out of defeat, once more the cup of hope had been dashed from our lips. All chances was gone; probably death, at best, imprisonment for life, awaited us.

The picture blurred; the submarine tilted and rose to the surface of the sea. Through the thick glass of the window we saw the scout-boat lay-to a cable's length distant. She was manned by a crew of lusty sailors, and in the stern sat an officer in the uniform of a German naval captain. We drew alongside and opened our deck. He stepped aboard.

Lieutenant Von Beeman sprang to his side and began to pour out the story of our attempt. The captain's brows contracted as he listened; incredulous at first, he grew more and more impassive and cold. At last he turned to Nikolai.

"What have you to say?" he asked.

"It is true," said my companion. "What are you going to do?"

The captain spoke more coldly, more formally than before. Nicolai turned to me.

"He says that he intends to hang us at his yard-arm before breakfast," he explained.

I looked around me desperately. Dawn was already flushing the east, the stars were paling, and, on the port bow, outlined against the saffron sky, was the long loast line of England.

"He cannot hang spies—even if we are spies—in peace time," I muttered. "It is against the code."

Nikolai translated, but the captain did not deign to notice me. It was the lieutenant who interposed.

"As for that fellow," he said, pointing to me, "let him hang if you prefer, captain. But not this other, who is evidently a high officer in the English service. Curse him," he shrieked, losing his self-control again. "He insulted me in the streets of Kiel. He called me a sheep's head—and I was in uniform."

"Calf's head, not sheep's head," Nikolai interposed.

"I demand satisfaction," shouted Von Beeman.

"I am afraid, lieutenant," said the captain, "that the honor of Germany must take precedence of yours."

"If it will be any satisfaction," said Nikolai, "I am no officer. I am an unofficial spy in nobody's service but my own."

"Is that true?" cried Von Beeman with apparent eagerness, staring at Nikolai. My comrade nodded. The lieutenant leaped forward with a cry of triumph.

"It is true," he exclaimed. "I questioned his veracity, and he showed no resentment. An officer does not lie. He is no officer. Well, do you wish my evidence, sir, at the court-martial?"

"There will be no court-martial, lieutenant," the captain answered. "They will be hanged immediately. Lie to until you see them at the yard-arm; then return to Kiel and report yourself to the commandant of the port. And now untie those fellows."

At the word from Von Beeman the sailors began to free us from our bonds. Meanwhile the German captain moved leisurely about the submarine, examining the mechanism with professional interest. When we were free he signed to us to precede him into the boat. We took our places and the sailors began to row us back to the man of war. It was almost light now. Behind us the submarine tossed heavily upon the waves. Looking backward, I could see Von Beeman standing amidship, gazing implacably after us. Then Nikolai nudged me and pointed furtively to the German captain.

He was beaming upon us, and in his expression there was something as near a wink as I imagine the naval regulations would allow. While I watched him, amazed, I heard one of the sailors, who had missed his stroke with the oar, utter a hearty curse in purest English.

But we were at the ship's side and ascending the ladder before I could draw the necessary inferences from what I had seen. The captain walked forward toward his quarters, signing to us to follow him. Presently we were alone with him in his cabin. Then he turned on Nikolai abruptly.

"Well done, sir," he said heartily. "I shall report your courageous action to the admiralty. Not only have you performed an act unparalleled in the history of the fleet, but you afforded me an opportunity to discover the complete secret of the mechanism of the new submarine."

"With your permission, sir, I will explain matters to my friend," said Nikolai, turning to me. But already the whole affair had become clear to me. It was an English battleship, and, by the ruse of the German flag, its captain had discovered the secret which England had wanted so badly. We were in friendly hands.

"Did you fulfill this mission by the direct suggestion of the admiralty?" the captain asked.

"No, sir," said Nikolai. "It was our own enterprise, and we trusted to the generosity of the English nation to reward us adequately.'

The captain started.

"What?" he cried. "Does nobody in England know that you embarked upon this perilous adventure?"

"Nobody but yourself and your men, sir," Nikolai answered.

The captain's manner changed in a way comical to see.

"Well, my men," he said, "you have had a fortunate escape. Now I tell you what I shall do. In five minutes a dinghy will be lowered from the side. You will enter it, and can, doubtless, pull yourselves ashore. We are not three miles from the Hampshire coast."

"And you will report us for the reward?" I asked.

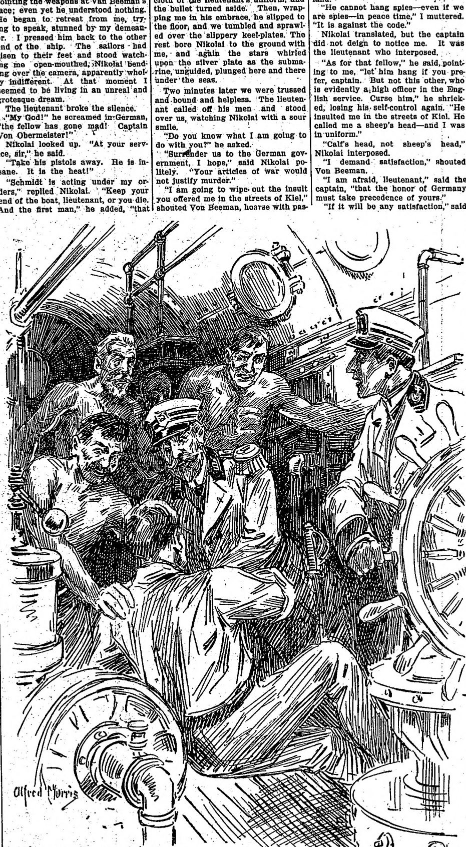
"Reward? What reward?"

Then I understood. He meant to take the entire credit for the achievement to himself. And, if we told our story in England, nobody would give us a hearing. I stood astonished, shaking with impotent rage and chagrin.

Then the captain laid his hand kindly upon my shoulder.

"Gentlemen," he said, addressing both of us, "be very thankful that you have escaped with your lives. You played a desperate game which you were ill prepared for. You came off no worse than you started. Half an hour ago and you would have given all you possess for life. You have your lives. Take my advice: go quickly, and at once."

Ten minutes later we were pulling for the English shore.



The sailors had hurled themselves on us.

MEASURES THE NERVE FORCE

Machine That Scientist Claims Has Great Possibilities—Experiments Made.

There is a remarkable little instrument, consisting of a steel cylinder attached to a vertical needle, for measuring human magnetism, that is attracting a good deal of attention in the occult library in Piccadilly. It is the invention of Doctor Fayol, who has been conducting a series of experiments before a committee of the French Academy of Medicine.

Explaining its purpose, M. W. de Kerlor said: "Its object is to demonstrate the existence of the emanation of nerve force from the human body.

"If you place the left hand in front of the cylinder, the needle will move in the same direction as the hands of a watch; if the right hand, the motion will be in the opposite direction. With all healthy and normal individuals the rotation of the needle is normal; if persons are ill, or even below par, the motion of the needle will be irregular and abnormal.

"All healthy bodies project regular currents of nerve force; unhealthy bodies absorb. That is why you hear of sick or elderly people who have not sufficient vital force to maintain the normal amount of physical strength absorbing human magnetism from younger and healthier persons.

Various experiments have been made with the instrument to show how variously it is affected.

Two hands of an opposite nature placed in front of the apparatus entirely stop the motion, but with two hands of the same nature it is accelerated.

As to the possibilities of the invention, M. de Kerlor said: "If you have an instrument which is capable of being propelled at the rate of 30 or 40 turns a minute quite automatically by an invisible force emanating from the human body, what may not be achieved by applying the magnetism of a hundred or of a thousand men to a much larger cylinder with a powerful lever?

The girl was willing, but the baseball player was diffident. She had to resort to strategy.

"Jim," she said, "there are several points of the game that I wish you would explain."

"Where shall I begin?" he asked, delighted.

"I should like to—er"—she hesitated, blushing—"know more about the 'squeeze play.'"—Judge.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Story of Nerve and Handsomely Dressed Woman

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—"Is there anything I can show you today?" asked an obliging clerk in one of the large department stores to a handsomely dressed woman.

"I want to buy some chairs, but can not decide on just the kind I like best. Aren't those candlesticks stunning?" replied the lady.

"Well, we have the finest stock in the city to select from. Is there any way I can accommodate you? I would be pleased to assist you in making your selection," earnestly replied the clerk.

"It is this way," replied the woman, seeing that the clerk was falling rapidly, "my husband is a traveling salesman and comes home only once a month. He will be home Wednesday night to spend Thursday with me and will leave early Friday morning. Will you not send out a dozen of these chairs and those two candlesticks Wednesday evening so that we can make our selection while he is here? Friday we can return those we do not keep."

"Certainly. What is your name and address?" asked the clerk.

Wednesday evening the store's wagon left the chairs and candlesticks. The maid placed them in the rooms waiting the approval of the husband.

Early in the week Mr. Traveling Man had issued invitations for a number of his friends to attend a stag party Wednesday night at his home, and all accepted. Mrs. Traveling Man had issued invitations for a card party Thursday evening, and all the guests accepted. The stag party was a success.

Friday morning, 9 a. m.—Ting, ling, ling. The telephone rang in the department store.

"This is Mrs. Traveling Man. Give me the furniture department."

"Hello! hello! This is the furniture department."

"Well, hubby and I have decided the chairs and candlesticks are not just suitable for our home and as he is so particular will have to ask you to send and get them. So so-r-r-ry."

The store removed the chairs and was none the wiser.

Big City Is an Overgrown Town; Just Read This

CHICAGO.—The city is only an overgrown town after all.

It was a cat, a shabby gray mouser, instinctively suggestive of the ash can in a back alley; a thin, scrawny representative on the species feline cadaverous and weasened; a frayed scrap of a cat of pronounced gutter tendencies; not a cat to be loved and petted nor to writhe gently in front of a glowing fire; not even a cat to scream shrill defiance at moonlight in company with its mates. In fact, it was a pathetic sort of a cat, a wisp of a creature whose life had been nothing more than a succession of fits and starts, blows and scornful epithets.

The Northwestern station poured forth its loop bent thousands. Each mind was full of the day's chores that loomed ahead. It was the city at its "citiest."

Then the cat—mud spattered, inconsequential, a cat of the city's streets. It danced across the wide concrete walk in front of the hurrying battalion of workers like a leaf blown before the wind. Before it sped a lead-colored lump with a squeak of terror. A cat chasing a rat.

Mary, 3, Walks Down Town, and Rides in Big Auto

DETROIT, MICH.—When a little girl gets new shoes it's quite the thing for her to want to show them off. That's Mary Williams' abiding belief, as expressed by her the other day. Anyway, it was the shoes that started it all, and somebody or something must be held responsible.

Those shoes caused a wonderful experience to come into Mary's life, wonderful for a girl of three years, and of course her mother was almost distraught with anxiety. For more than three hours Mary was among the missing. She and the new shoes went a-walking, and the whole combination, somehow or other, got to the city, in that wonderful land of enchantment known to every child as "down town."

Of course, Mary was bewildered. She had been down town before, but always she had felt the guiding hand of her mother, and she had been through the worst places. This was her first lone-hand invasion, and it frightened her.

The roar of traffic sounded in her ears. Automobiles and street cars leaped at her from every direction. People rushed by her and jostled her rudely, and she looked in vain for a friendly smile or a cheering word.

Right at this juncture relief came, and then followed the most wonderful part of the whole proceedings. Traffic Officer William Denny was the rescurer. He found Mary dodging street cars at Woodward avenue and Larned street, and he picked her out of the crowd. She confided in him and told him she was lost.

Modern Amazon Sits Upon Man Until Cops Come

PITTSBURGH, PA.—From under the weight of a modern Amazon to a police station cell was great relief, the other night, for Thomas Kearney, aged twenty-four, who gave his address of 4822 Hatfield street. Not until two policemen arrived would Mrs. Josephine Smith, aged twenty-five, of Forty-eighth and Butler streets, give him the relief.

"Oh, Lord!" gasped Kearney, himself no midget, as the officers assured his captor that it was safe to let him up and she slowly arose from her sitting posture atop of Kearney's chest. It was several minutes before Kearney could "get his breath," as he explained to the officers, in order to make the trip to the station house.

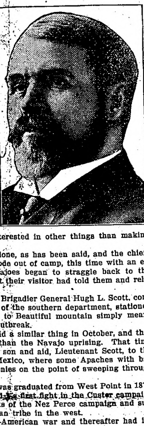
Mrs. Smith was strolling along Hatfield street, on her way home, at 10 o'clock, swinging a mesh bag in her hand. Kearney jumped from a doorway, she says, and grabbed at the purse.

"Have a care!" warned Mrs. Smith, but Kearney heeded not the warning. He laughed aloud at the woman's bravery and grabbed again, she says, this time wresting the bag from her hand. He started to run, but Mrs. Smith tackled him with the skill of an All-American footballer and the two went to the sidewalk in a heap. Mrs. Smith quickly extricated herself and climbing on top of the chest of the prostrate man sat thereon. The while shouting at the top of her voice, "Police! Police!"

The usual length of time that it requires the police to answer an emergency call was not of so much concern to Mrs. Smith as it was to Kearney.

WHO'S WHO ~and WHEREFORE

PACIFIER OF THE NAVAJOES



Here are some interesting facts regarding Hugh L. Scott, who persuaded the Navajoes not to go on the warpath recently.

Mole Tequop, the man who talks with his hands, rode into the armed encampment of the warlike Navajoes on Beautiful mountain, Colorado. He rode alone except for one old Navajo scout who had gone out to meet him 40 miles away from United States soldiers who had been sent out after the two-wife men had jumped the Shiprock agency, two weeks before.

There was considerable concern about those Indians, not only in the country where they were, but at Washington. The Navajoes are good fighters. These men were well armed and their hearts were bitter because somebody had tried to break up their polygamous habits.

They had said they were ready to fight until they were killed, and just at this time troops along the southern edge of the United States are more interested in other things than making good Indians out of bad Indians.

Mole Tequop rode into this camp alone, as has been said, and the chiefs called for a powwow. Hours later he rode out of camp, this time with an escort of old men. That night the Navajoes began to straggle back to the agency to surrender, satisfied with what their visitor had told them and relying upon his advice.

Mole Tequop is the Indian name for Brigadier General Hugh L. Scott, commanding the Second brigade of cavalry of the southern department, stationed at Fort Bliss, El Paso, Tex. The visit to Beautiful mountain simply meant that he has prevented another Indian outbreak.

It is not generally known that he did a similar thing in October, and that for a time looked much more serious than the Navajo uprising. That time he left El Paso and journeyed with his son and aid, Lieutenant Scott, to the Mescalero Indian reservation of New Mexico, where some Apaches with bad records had left the agency on their ponies on the point of sweeping through the country.

General Scott is a Kentuckian and was graduated from West Point in 1876. He was assigned to the cavalry and had his first fight in the Custer campaign of that year. Later he was in the fights of the Nez Perce campaign and subsequently became known to every Indian tribe in the west.

He served throughout the Spanish-American war and thereafter had important assignments, including the superintendency of West Point from 1906 to 1910. General Scott's mother was a great-granddaughter of Benjamin Franklin. He is a very strict soldier, but liked by his men. He is a total abstainer and does not use tobacco in any form. He is fifty-seven years old.

SAYS TEUTONS FRIENDS OF UNCLE SAM

Prince von Buelow's references to the relations of the United States and Germany in one of the chapters of the book on "Germany Under the Reign of William II.," in which he deals with German policy, show how much the former imperial chancellor valued the friendship of the American government and people. He says, in part:

"During the Spanish-American war a portion of German public opinion displayed strong sympathy for Spain, and this was not agreeable to the United States. The manner in which incidents that occurred between the German and American fleets at Manila were made the most of in a portion of the English and American press also cast a cloud over the relations of Germany and the United States.

"From the point of view of sensible policy there is no reason why Germany and the United States should not be on the best of terms. I do not see any point where German and American interests clash, nor in the future do I see any point where the lines of our development should cross each other in an inimical way.

"In the United States live about 12,000,000 Germans. Among these is a growing effort since the foundation of the German-American National Union in 1901, while remaining loyal to their new Fatherland, to keep up their relations with their old home and to strengthen them. So long as politics here and in the United States are in calm hands, and overdone expressions of friendship as well as nervous feelings in connection with occasional frictions are avoided—and these things happen now and then in economical matters—we need not have any fears as to our relations with the United States.

HOBSON'S BRIDEGROOM STORY

Representative Richmond P. Hobson claimed, in an interview, that the words "bitter attack," which were used to describe his recent debate in the house, were an exaggeration.

"I'll admit," he said, "that this discussion was rather heated, and I'll admit that neither my opponent nor myself, paid each other many compliments. But political controversies seldom yield compliments."

The hero of the Merrimac smiled.

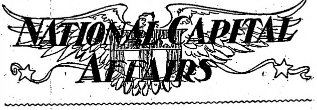
"It is in situations like the young Alabama bridegroom's," he continued, "that we must look for the perfect compliment, and here it is:

"A young Alabama bridegroom asked the clergyman who had just married him what the fee would be.

"'Oh, well,' said the other, not knowing the young man's circumstances, 'you can pay me whatever you think it's worth.'

"Turning, the young fellow looked his bride over from head to foot, and then, rolling his eyes, he replied, mournfully:

"'Why, sah, you has ruined me for life, you has for sure.'"



An Old Man Wearing Army Button Shines Shoes

WASHINGTON.—Have you seen him? And did you have to swallow a lump? Maybe you have missed him, so far, for he doesn't stay put. His business requires circulation. And, besides, you can't stay still in November when you have no overcoat. You've just naturally got to keep going.

Yesterday he was down by the soldiers' monument—an army button on his coat and a shoe brush in his hand—waiting and waiting—until Providence came by in the shape of a man with one of those loud, cheery voices that God gives to many men, but which only Dickens could describe.

"Why, bless my soul! Where did you get that old kit? Give me a shine."

He put a foot on the small shoe-shine box. Remember when the kiddies used to shine 'em up on the streets? Gee, it's a long time back! And the other man creaked his joints into a crouch and proceeded to put on a polish.

To a woman who had happened along it did not seem probable that a customer wearing as good clothes as a tailor can make would really enjoy having his shoes smeared over with blacking that you can bet your life wasn't Day & Martin's, or that he wanted them scratched up with a cheap brush by a wavering hand. Still, you can't always rely on the sex supposings of a spinster soul whose only knowledge of man has been of the mail—note the spelling, please—mail correspondence variety. Anyhow, whatever his reason, the man put one foot and then the other on the box and told the other man about how he used to be a bootblack—before the shoe-shine kiddies vanished with the coming of the asphalt. And did it pay? And wouldn't it be better to get something more profitable and sheltered?

Congressman Finds His Boyhood's Wish Fulfilled

REPRESENTATIVE CLAUDE WEAVER of Oklahoma finds in his coming to congress the fulfillment of a wish expressed ever since he was nine years old. At that age he began his dairy with the statement that he was hours on his hands, decided to go out in the suburbs and rehearse his oration. He selected a secluded spot on the road along which ran a long, high brick wall, with a gate at the end. Weaver did not know it, but this was the state lunatic asylum.

ANOTHER BUG LOOSE

Up and down the road he paced, talking most vehemently, gesticulating wildly to an imaginary determined to be one of the nation's representatives. And ever since then he has worked with this object in view.

Weaver settled in Oklahoma when there were few white people living there. But in one of his trips in Texas, to deliver a political speech, he had an adventure which seemed at the time much more serious than it does now. He reached the town to which he was billed and, as he had a few audience, shaking his head and pounding one hand upon the other. People who passed shook their heads sadly.

Presently, as he neared the great iron gate, four uniformed men rushed out, grabbed him by the arms and legs and carried him, kicking and fighting, inside the grounds. Weaver, choking with rage, demanded an explanation of such an outrage.

"Aw, g'wan!" chortled one of the brawny guards, setting Weaver on his feet with a jerk. "What you handing us—we knows you is one of them bugs outen ward C."

"Lunatic!" yelled Weaver, who now saw into what spot he had landed. "Lunatic? Why, I am a politician and expect to go to congress!"

"Well," drawled the guard, with a grin, "I don't know but what you've got to just the same kind of place now!"

Representative Slemp Finds an Agent of Cupid

REPRESENTATIVE BASCOM SLEMP of Virginia was until recently a bachelor. A few years ago, however, when he was "heart whole and fancy free," he was speaking to a large assembly at a political gathering. The audience was full of handsome women and pretty girls who were, of course, much interested in the tariff when it is explained by a young bachelor who lived in official Washington.

YOU'LL GO TO FOREIGN PARTS TO GET YOUR BRIDE

Slemp got along famously, carrying with him the sympathy of the crowd. But at last a fellow in a back seat rose to make a statement.

"I like Slemp," he roared. "Slemp's all right. The only thing I have agin him is that he is not married. Now, I propose to this honorable gathering that we refuse to vote for him unless he promises to git married."

Slemp was equal to the occasion.

"I acknowledge my desolate state," he exclaimed, "yet it is not my fault, but that of the fair ones who will not have me. If there is any one among the many lovely ladies in this audience who will accept my heart and hand, I am only too willing to be led to the altar."

The man jumped to his feet again excitedly.

"No, you don't," he exclaimed. "You'll have to go to foreign parts to git your bride—all the girls around here have got too much sense to take you!"

Senator Went to Capitol Only Half Dressed

THEY are telling this story on John R. Thornton, senator from Louisiana: Thornton arose absent-mindedly, dressed himself fully, he thought, and went into the dining room of his hotel for breakfast. The head waiter grinned at him a bit, but the senator, who was in a hurry, failed to notice it.

WHERE'S YOUR COLLAR ?

He just caught a street car bound for the capitol and plumped himself between Postmaster General Burleson and Edward Keating, representative from Colorado.

"See you're dressed for hot weather," commented the postmaster.

Senator Thornton, attired in white linen, nodded his head complacently.

"Yes," he said, "we of the south learn to do that."

And he wondered why his hearers smiled in an embarrassed manner.

When he reached the senate office building the elevator man said:

"Good morning, senator. I see you're prepared for the heat."

This rather puzzled Senator Thornton, for he always wears linen in summer. The explanation of it all came when his son Gordon, who is also his secretary, saw him.

"Say, father," he yelled as Senator Thornton entered his office. "What on earth did you do with your collar?"

Thornton grabbed at his neck wildly. He had on neither collar nor tie.

SURVEY OF ISLAND OF SAKURA TAKEN

DISINTEGRATION OF SAKURA-JIMA MOUNTAIN FEARED AT ANY TIME.

OBSERVATORY IS KEPT OPEN

Staff Remained on Duty and Faced to Record Each Phase of the Terrible Disaster—Rescue Ship Reports After Saving 158 From Death.

BULLETIN.

Kagoshima, Japan.—Two further violent eruptions of the volcano Sakura Jima, accompanied by a severe earthquake, have occurred causing the collapse of many more buildings. Numbers of the inhabitants of Kagoshima who had returned fled again in terror from the city. Ashes are falling thickly.

Kagoshima, Japan, Jan. 17. — The houses on the island of Sakura—those that still stand—are enveloped in lava and resemble gigantic wasps. The fugitives who have returned are still in a terrified condition and refuse to enter their homes, except to make a hurried search for valuables. Fears are entertained for the disintegration of Sakura-Jima.

Island Is Covered.

The western part of the island is thickly coated with melted sulphur. The southern part is covered with a great deposit of ashes. The central part is obscured by the heavy smoke. Throughout the eruptions, the staff of the Kagoshima observatory remained at their posts, facing extermination and calmly recording each phase. They were almost suffocated by poisonous gases.

Rescue Steamer Reports.

Kobe, Japan.—The Ryukyumaru, a passenger steamer, has arrived here after having rescued 158 of the inhabitants of the village of Yumara, on the island of Sakura-Jima and landed them at Kagoshima. All the residents of another village were found to have been rescued with the exception of one, who was taken aboard.

The captain of the steamer witnessed the awful spectacle of the eruption of the volcano.

Flames leaped from the ground, setting the villages on fire. While the steamer lay off shore ashes to the depth of one foot fell on her decks. On the way to Kobe there was a pall of ashes like a dense fog.

TANGO IS AGAIN DENOUNCED

New Dance Is Prohibited in Rome—Fashions, Some Shows, and Certain Papers Scored.

Rome, Jan. 17.—Cardinal Basilio Pompili, vicar general of Rome, representing the pontiff, has issued a pastorial letter denouncing the tango and also certain newspapers, theatrical performances and fashions, which he declares are perverting souls. The cardinal says:

"The tango, which has already been condemned by illustrious bishops and is prohibited even in protestant countries, must be absolutely prohibited in the seat of the Roman pontiff, the center of the Roman Catholic religion."

He urges the clergy courageously to raise their voice "in defending the sanctity of Christian usages against the dangers threatening and the overwhelming immorality of the new paganism."

He warns parents that if they do not protect their children from corruption they will be guilty before God of failure in their most sacred duties.

Publication of Engagements Asked.

Chicago, Jan. 17.—An amendment to the marriage laws which would require the publishing of engagements two weeks before the issuance of licenses, will be sought by Chicagoans prominent in juvenile protection work. At a meeting at Hull House, Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton, president of the Juvenile Protective association, was selected to visit judges of the circuit court and urge them to draw such an amendment. The meeting was the result of the marriage of Julia Gillison, aged 15, and Fred Drew, aged 20.

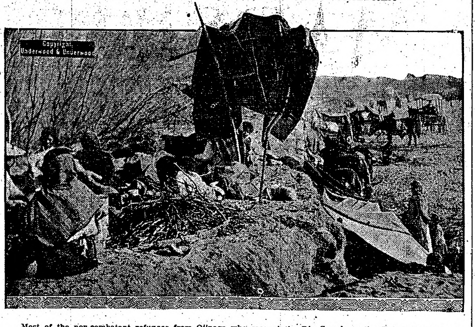
Sermons for All Near-Weds.

Davenport, Ia., Jan. 17.—A series of lecture sermons on the "Trials and Tribulations in the Matrimonial Game" in which he will deliver gratis adivce to young men and women about to marry, will be given by Rev. Leroy M. Coffman, pastor of the First Presbyterian church here. Nine sermons compose the series, the first to be given next Sunday on "The Kind of a person to Choose for a Mate."

Women Voters Want Changes.

Chicago, Jan. 19.—In only four of 37 precincts in the First ward can women vote unashamed. This is the finding of the Woman's party in the city's busiest ward. The women demand that polling sites with a cleaner atmosphere be chosen at once. They ask that the voting booths in the first precinct be changed from a police station to the public library, in the second precinct from a "dirty tailor shop" to the Art Institute and from barber shops, cigar stores and bath houses to schools and hotels.

REFUGEE CAMP FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN



Most of the non-combatant refugees from Ojinaga who crossed the Rio Grande to the United States were women and children. One of their improvised camps is shown in this photograph.

DESPERADO STILL HOLDS OUT

TRAPPED MAN GIVEN UNTIL WEDNESDAY TO SURRENDER.

Beardsley's Wife Wounded by a Shot; Outlaw Refuses to Let Doctor Enter.

Mayville, N. Y., Jan. 20.—Edward Beardsley still holds his barricaded shack near Summerdale, where he took refuge six days ago after a shooting affray. He has since defied the authorities to take him.

Lying on a bed in the front room of the house is the woman known as Mrs. Beardsley. She has a bullet in her right leg. One of the children accidentally knocked Beardsley's revolver off the window sill and the bullet hit her, according to Beardsley's statement.

Sheriff Anderson's plans for the outlaw's capture miscarried, but Beardsley says he will surrender Wednesday to Ray F. Pickard, who has been retained by his brothers as his attorney. Provided the nine children have been delivered to a brother and his mother-in-law, Mrs. Austin of Youngsville, Pa., Beardsley says he will go to Mayville with Pickard and surrender to Sheriff Anderson.

The sheriff promised to give Beardsley until Wednesday noon. Meanwhile food will be provided by the sheriff. Although the woman who has kept watch with him needs medical attention, Beardsley refused to let Dr. Reynolds of Mayville enter the house. He demanded that Reynolds pass the bandages and antiseptics through the window.

If Beardsley does not give up the children and the woman by Wednesday noon, Sheriff Anderson says he will storm the house. His two sharpshooters, William Fred Hooper and C. J. L. Sunberg, will lead the deputies.

PREDICTS WAR WITH MEXICO

Republican Congressman Criticises Policy of Administration and Assails Secretary Bryan.

Washington, Jan. 17.—Intervention in Mexico as the only result of the present policy of the United States was predicted in the house by Representative Gillette, Republican, of Massachusetts, during the course of a war speech in which he assailed Secretary Bryan. Recognition of Huerta early in the Mexican trouble, Mr. Gillette said, would have offered the best chance of quieting the disturbance.

"When the war comes," said he, "will be no excuse that the secretary of state has delivered brilliant speeches in favor of peace. An orational glorification of peace is not sufficient atonement for a policy whose legitimate and logical result is war."

No Copper Strike Inquiry.

Washington, Jan. 19.—Democrats of the house rules committee have decided against ordering congressional investigation of strikes in the Michigan copper field and the Colorado coal district. Republicans and progressives tried for a meeting of the entire committee, but the democratic majority, in private conference, voted that no investigation resolution be reported.

Lady Victoria Pery Loops Loop.

London, Jan. 19.—Lady Victoria Mary Pery, daughter of the Earl of Limerick, looped the loop at the Hendon aerodrome in an aeroplane driven by Gustav Hamil.

Mystery in Death of Official.

New York, Jan. 17.—Richard D. Lankford, a vice president and secretary of the Southern railroad, was found dead from gas asphyxiation in his bachelor apartments in Brooklyn. The police and the coroner decided he had committed suicide, but later developments cast doubt on the theory. Failure to establish a motive is mainly responsible for the emphatic assertion of his friends, and Miss Nellie Patterson, a Brooklyn society girl, whom he was to have married today, that his death was accidental.

SUBMARINE STICKS ON BOTTOM OF SEA

LIVES OF ELEVEN BRITISH SAILORS PERHAPS LOST AS RESULT.

TRYING TO RAISE VESSEL

Sister Ships Work Desperately to Float "A-7" of First Flotilla That Crew May Not Perish.

Plymouth, Eng., Jan. 19.—Two officers and nine men, comprising the crew of the British submarine boat "A7," are trapped in their craft beneath the waters of Whitesand bay, about five miles southwest of Plymouth. Whether the men are dead or alive has not been established, but navy officials here expressed the opinion last night that all had perished.

Can't Locate Boat.

The exact spot where the little vessel sank has not been definitely fixed. The "A7" in company with "A8" and "A9" made a plunge while engaged in maneuvers. Her sister ships came to the surface at the end of the maneuvers, but nothing has been seen of the "A7" since she opened her valves and dived.

After the maneuvers were over two sister submarines noticed that their companion did not come up, and immediately signaled for assistance to Plymouth and Devonport.

Salvage vessels hurried to the scene. Bubbles were seen rising to the surface in Cawsand bay, and grapplers were thrown out to bring the wrecked vessel to the surface, although the bubbles indicated that its hull had been penetrated and caused despair of the salvation of the crew.

Description of Boat.

The "A-7" was one of a class of nine boats number "A-5" to "A-13." It was built in 1904 and measured 150 feet in length. Its submerged displacement was 204 tons. Its engines developed an indicated horsepower of 600, giving it a surface speed of sixteen knots and a submerged speed of nine knots.

The submarine was executing diving maneuvers with the rest of the first flotilla stationed here, consisting of the "A-7," "A-8" and "A-9." When the other boats rose to the surface the absence of the "A-7" was noticed. Signals were at once made to Plymouth and Devonport and these brought the depotship, Onyx, and several salvage steamers to the scene at full speed.

Dania Finally in Port.

Havana, Jan. 19.—The Hamburg-American liner, Dania, several days overdue from Hamburg, has arrived here and anchored. The captain of the vessel reported that during the voyage the Dania met with a strong wind and heavy seas which slowed her speed and caused her delay in reaching Havana.

Will Recommend Policemen.

Madison, Wis., Jan. 19.—The Wisconsin vice commission has practically decided to recommend to the state legislature in 1915 that every first, third and fourth class city of the state be required to have at least one woman police officer. This is the outcome of the investigation now in progress.

Inquiry Before Laws Asked.

Chicago, Jan. 19.—Resolutions asking that a congressional committee be appointed to investigate conditions and operations of grain exchanges in the country before any laws regulating the exchanges are passed, were adopted by the council of grain exchanges of America in annual session here. The council also declared its members desired to place their affairs on a footing acceptable to congress and the country. James C. Murray of the Chicago Board of Trade was elected president.

BANDIT FIGHTS PISTOL DUEL

TRAIN ROBBER AND SHERIFF EXCHANGE SEVERAL SHOTS.

Desperado Makes Good His Escape With Loot—Suspect Is Under Arrest.

Atlanta, Ga., Jan. 19.—A bandit boarded Western and Atlantic passenger train No. 1 at Vinings, Ga., robbed passengers in one of the coaches of several hundred dollars and after engaging in a pistol duel with a deputy sheriff who was on board, jumped from the train at Bolton, Ga.

Authorities at Bolton, which is seven miles west of Atlanta, have taken into custody a man said to answer the description of the robber.

Train No. 1 runs from Chattanooga to Atlanta and most of the passengers were residents of Chattanooga and intermediate towns.

As the train passed through Vinings shortly after 7 o'clock a man entered the chair car, drew a pistol and began to collect valuaables from the passengers. He had robbed more than a score when C. C. Heard an Atlanta deputy, who was returning from Rome, Ga., opened fire upon him. Half a dozen shots were exchanged. Heard being wounded slightly by a bullet which passed through his cheek. Whether the bandit was hurt is not known. He swung from the train as it slowed down at Bolton and disappeared.

The robber did not enter the express or mail cars. The amount stolen from passengers is believed to have been small although one man reported that he had given up $500.

The Western and Atlanta railroad is a part of the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis system.

The man arrested at Bolton will be brought here for identification. Passengers and trainmen said the robber wore a mask, and were uncertain they could identify him.

COBEQUID WRECK EXPLAINED

Light Was Out on Trinity Rock and Commander Had No Warning of Danger.

St. John, N. B., Jan. 17.—The light on the buoy that marks Trinity rock, where the liner Cobequid was wrecked, was out, said her commander, Captain John Hawson, who arrived here on the government steamer Lansdowne. He was the last man to leave his ship. This statement was borne out by the agent of the Canadian marine department officers here who said the department was notified late Jan. 7 that the light was out. An announcement of this was made in the newspapers and the shipping federation at Montreal was notified.

A new buoy was placed on the steamer Lansdowne last Saturday to be taken to the ledge, but owing to changes among the officers, she was without her proper complement and unable to proceed to sea. The Lansdowne was ready to sail on Tuesday, the day the Cobequid struck.

With the light buoy out of commission, Captain Hawson had no warning of danger.

Threaten Life of Jerome.

New York, Jan. 17.—A dozen anonymous letters threatening death to William Travers Jerome unless he discontinues his attempts to get Harry K. Thaw back in Matteawan have been turned over to a detective agency.

Note Extension Granted Road.

Boston, Jan. 19.—An agreement by a majority of the holders of $10,000,000 of the notes of the Boston and Maine railroad, due on Feb. 3, to an extension for four months, is announced here. Directors of the company hope that the minority holders will make the same concessions. In any event they say that the action of the majority has saved the company from possible bankruptcy or a receivership for the time being at least.

WILL TRY TO END CONGRESS BY JUNE

NATIONAL LAWMAKERS WANT TO BE FREE TO TAKE PART IN CAMPAIGN.

THE MEASURES NOW PENDING

Survey of Important Bills to Come Up—Alaska Railroad Bill Certain to Pass Senate on Thursday.

Washington, Jan. 20.—Congress has much business to transact before it undertakes consideration of anti-trust legislation and it is the aim of Democratic leaders to shorten the session as much as possible.

With the congressional campaign coming next fall and the Republicans and Progressives already active, the majority leaders are insistent that all legislative business be disposed of before July 1st at the latest, in order that every man can be in his district to fight for retention of a Democratic majority in both houses of the next congress.

Sensational Contests Pending.

The fact that senatorial contests under the direct elections amendment to the constitution are pending in many states, makes the situation more urgent from a campaign standpoint.

President Wilson, as a leader of the dominant party, is as eager as the chieftans in congress to limit the session as much as possible and all are pulling together to expedite legislative matters. Conferences on a legislative program will be held in the near future.

It is practically certain appropriation bills and many other important matters will be out of the way before the trust program is ready. Among the most important measures pending are the Alaska railroad bill, which will pass the senate next Thursday; rural credit legislation, to be undertaken by the banking and currency committee soon; regulation of stock exchanges as proposed in the Owen bill, upon which public hearings are to begin February 4; and the Panama canal tolls question, which will come up in a joint resolution introduced by Representative Adamson, chairman of the interstate and foreign commerce committee which would suspend conditionally for two years the provision of the Panama canal act granting free passage to American coastwise vessels.

Bill Up This Week.

The Alaskan railroad bill and the agricultural extension bill will occupy the attention of the senate most of this week. The Alaskan bill, which was urged by the president in his last message, and would provide for a government-built and operated railroad into the interior of the territory, is certain to pass. Senator Chamberlain secured unanimous consent for a vote on Thursday.

There is little opposition to the bill, and the house already has the same subject under consideration to be taken up again Wednesday. With the Alaskan bill out of the way, Senator Smith of Georgia will press the agricultural extension bill, which would provide ultimately an annual appropriation of $3,000,000 to be expended through the state agricultural colleges in educating the farmers of the country on advanced agricultural lines. An amendment to increase the ultimate appropriation to $5,000,000, offered by Senator Simmons of North Carolina, is pending.

A caucus of house Democrats on the question of creating a house committee on suffrage is being agitated by some of the western members.

THOUSANDS ARE SUFFERING

Japanese Volcanoes Subside, But Refugees Are in Great Distress Because of Food Scarcity.

Tokio, Jan. 20.—Late advices from Kagoshima say that the volcanoes are subsiding. There is great suffering in the entire section, for it has been found impossible to give shelter or food to the thousands who have lost their homes.

The American Peace society of Japan has issued an appeal to the people of the United States for contributions to relieve sufferers from the famine.

Three-Cent "Movies" for Schools.

New York, Jan. 20.—Moving pictures with three cents as the price of admission, are to be given in the East Side public schools, it is announced by Dr. William H. Maxwell, city superintendent of schools. The "Blood and Thunder" views will be omitted and pictures of an instructive and educational character will be interspersed with innocent and diverting photo plays.

Copper Strike Six Months Old.

Houghton, Mich., Jan. 20.—With the end of the sixth month of the copper miners' strike in sight, operators and union men appear to be no nearer an agreement than they were when the struggle began on July 23 last. The continued mild weather has confirmed labor leaders in the belief they will be able to hold the striking forces intact throughout the winter. They assert the Western Federation of Miners is prepared to support the local organization through a long contest if necessary.

Hard to Pad.

Not long ago a cub reporter on one of the large dailies was assigned by the city editor to cover a meeting of the board of trustees of a public library.

"Bring a story of about 400 words," said the editor.

At a late hour that night this story not being forthcoming, the youngster was sent for.

"How about that story of the board meeting?" asked the editor.

"It isn't finished yet. You told me to make 400 words of it. So far I have managed to get only 300."

"What did the board do?"

"They met, called the roll and adjourned until Tuesday evening."—Lippincott's.

WOMAN REFUSES OPERATION

Tells How She Was Saved by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Logansport, Ind. — "My baby was over a year old and I bloated till I was a burden to myself. I suffered from female trouble so I could not stand on my feet and I felt like millions of needles were pricking me all over. At last my doctor told me that all that would save me was an operation, but this I refused. I told my husband to get me a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I would try it before I would submit to any operation. He did so and I improved right along. I am now doing all my work and feeling fine.

"I hope other suffering women will try your Compound. I will recommend it to all I know." — Mrs. DANIEL D. B. DAVIS, 110 Franklin St., Logansport, Ind.

Since we guarantee that all testimonials which we publish are genuine, is it not fair to suppose that if Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has the virtue to help these women it will help any other woman who is suffering in a like manner?

If you are ill do not drag along until an operation is necessary, but at once take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

The MARSHAL

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, in the home of the lad's parents in the village of Vicques, France, where the emperor had briefly stopped to hold a council of war. Napoleon prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois meets a stranger who is astonished when the boy tells him of his ambition. Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The general offers Francois a home at the Chateau. The boy refuse to leave his parents, but in the end becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chat eau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis's son while the former goes to America. The Marquis before leaving for America asks Francois to be a friend his son. The boy solemnly promises.

CHAPTER IX.

The Castle Children.

There was a farm in the Valley Delesmontes—five miles it was from Vicques—which was a dependence of the seigneury; for centuries the same family had held it, and it was considered the richest holding for a peasant in that part of the world. Just now the family all at once came to an end. It was necessary to find new tenants, and the general offered the place to Le Francois and La Claire. Even in their best days they had not been so prosperous as this would make them. But what about Francois? The general glowered at them from deep eyes.

"There's always a screw somewhere in every good thing. This time it's the boy."

There was a silence. Claire trembled.

"It will go hard with the lad to give us up," she brought out softly.

"He won't give you up; I should not respect him if he gave you up," the general thundered, and the two peasants breathed more freely. This great good fortune was not, after all, the price of their son.

By degrees the three came to an understanding. A tutor was to be engaged for the three children; Francois was to live at the castle as if—it should be explained to him—he were going away to school, and every Friday he was to walk to the Ferme du Val—the Valley Farm—and stay with his people until Sunday afternoon.

This new order of things was well settled before six months had passed after the going of the Marquis Zappi. And then in three or four months more something happened.

Francois was alone with the general when the letter come. His eyes were on his seigneur's face as he read the letter and the boy saw the blood rush through the weather-hardened skin in a brown-red flood, and then fade out, leaving it gray. The boy had never seen the general look so. With that, the big arms were thrown out on the table and the big grizzled head fell into them.

Then he lifted his head and told the boy how the friend whom he had found lately, after so many years of separation, had gone away not to come back in this life, and how Pietro was fatherless. Francois, holding tightly with both fists to the general's hand, listened wide-eyed, struck to the heart.

"But he had a brave life, my seigneur—it is the best thing that there is. My mother said so. My mother told me that we shall smile later, when we are with the good God, to think that we ever feared death on this earth. For she says one spends a long time with the good God later, and all one's dear friends come, and it is pleasant and it is for a long, long time, while here it is, after all, quite short. Is not that true, my seigneur? My mother said it."

Big little Pietro had to be told what had happened and how the general was now to be a father to him as best he might, and Alixe and Francois would be his sister and brother. He took the blow dumbly and went about his studies next morning, but for many days he could not play, and only Francois could make him speak. He was handsome—extraordinarily handsome—and a lovable good child, but slow in initiative where Francois was ready, shy where Francois was friends with all the world, steady-going where the peasant boy was brilliant. Between the two, of such contrasting types, was an unshaken bond from the first, and at this age it seemed to be the little peasant who had everything to give. Smaller physically, weaker in muscle than the big-boned son of North Italy, he yet took quite naturally an attitude of protection and guidance, and Pietro accepted it without hesitation.

Two years slid past noiselessly, unnoticed, and it was vacation time; it was August of the year 1824. The old chateau of Vicques—the ruin—lay back behind the corn fields and smiled in hot sunlight.

A tall lad of fourteen, another boy, slighter, quicker, darker, and a little girl of eleven in a short white dress, wandered through the ruins, talking earnestly now, silent now, filling the grim place with easy laughter again. Alixe and Francois and Pietro were growing up; the general already grumbled words about kittens turning into cats, as he looked at them.

"Just behind the great stone there," Alixe formulated, "was the dog's bedroom. Of course, a great monsieur like the dog had his own bedroom—yes, and office, too—and maybe his dining-room."

And the joke was enough on that lazy day of vacation to set peals of laughter ringing through the ruins. Alixe stopped laughing suddenly.

"Who is that?" she demanded. Her eyes were lifted to the hill rising behind the green mound, and the glance of the others followed hers. A young man, a boy, was coming lightly down the slope, and something in his figure and movement made it impossible even at a distance that it should be any one of the village. He saw them, and came forward, and his cap was off quickly as he glanced at Alixe. But with a keen look at the three, it was Francois to whom he spoke.

"Is this France?" he asked.

"But yes, Monsieur," Francois answered wondering—and in a moment he wondered more. The strange boy, his cap flung from him, dropped on his knees and kissed the grass that grew over the Roman governor's foundations. With that he was standing again, looking at them unashamed from his quiet gray eyes.

"It is the first time I have touched the soil of France since I was seven years old," he stated, not as if to excuse his act, but as if explaining something historical. And was silent.

The strange boy talked very little; they could not recollect that he asked questions, after his first startling question; yet here was Alixe, the very spirited and proud little Alixe, anxious to make him understand everything of their own affairs.

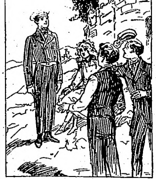
"I am Alixe," she began—and stopped short, seized with shyness. Was it courtesy to explain to the young monsieur about her distinguished father? She found herself suddenly in an agony of confusion. Then the stranger made a low bow and spoke in the gentlest friendly tones.

"It is enough. It is a charming name, Mademoiselle Alixe. I believe I shall now think it the most charming name in France."

"She has more of a name than that, however, Monsieur," and Francois stepped across the grass and stood by the little girl, her knight, unconscious of the part he played. "It is a very grand name, the other one. For our seigneur, the father of Alixe, is Monsieur the Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, a general of Napoleon himself; was indeed with the Emperor at St. Helena."

Francois had no false modesty, no self-consciousness; he felt that he had placed Alixe's standing now in the best light possible. The strange boy felt it, too, it seemed, for he started as Francois spoke of Napoleon; his reserved face brightened and his cap was off and sweeping low as he bowed again to Alixe more deeply. Francois was delighted. It was in him to enjoy dramatic effect, as it is in most Frenchmen. He faced about to Pietro.

"This one, Monsieur," he went on, much taken with himself as master of ceremonies, "is Monsieur the Marquis Zappi of Italy. His father also fought for the great captain."



"I Am Louis Bonaparte."

The quiet strange boy interrupted swiftly. "I know," he said. "Of the Italian corps under Prince Eugene; also on the staff of Lannes. I know the name well," and he had Pietro's hand in a firm grasp and was looking into the lad's embarrassed face with his dreamy keen eyes.

The children, surprised, were yet too young to wonder that a boy scarcely older than themselves should have the army of Napoleon at his fingers' ends; he gave them no time to think about it.

"One sees, without names, that you are of the noblesse," he said simply, embracing the three in his sleepy glance. He turned to Francois. "And you, Monsieur the spokesman? You are also of a great Bonapartist house?"

Francois stood straight and slim; his well-knit young body in his military dress was carried with all the assurance of an aristocrat. He smiled his brilliant exquisite smile into the older boy's face.

"Me—I am a peasant," he said cheerfully. "I have no house."

"He is a peasant—yes. But he is our brother, Pietro's and mine, and no prince is better than Francois—not one."

"Or half so good," Pietro put in with his slow tones.

"You are likely right," the stranger agreed laconically.

And then without questions asked, in rapid eager sentences, the three had told him how it was; how Francois, refusing to leave the cottage, was yet the son of the castle. With that they were talking about the village of Vicques, and its antiquity, and then of the old chateau; and one told the legend of the treasure and of the guardian dog.

"Just over the wall there is the opening where he appeared to old Pierre Tremblay," Francois pointed out.

"I think I should like to climb the wall," the stranger said.

And he did. The others watching anxiously, he crawled out on the uncertain pile ten feet in air. A big stone crashed behind him; he crawled on. Then there was a hoarse rumble of loosened masonry, and down came the great blocks close to his hands—he was slipping! And, above, the wall swayed. Then, in the instant of time before the catastrophe, Francois had sprung like a cat into the center of danger and pushed the other boy, violently reeling, across the grass out of harm's way.

Alixe screamed once sharply. Francois lay motionless on his face and the great stones rained around him. It was all over in a moment; in a moment more a shout of joy rose from Pietro, for Francois lifted his head and began crawling difficultly, with Pietro's help, out of the debris.

"I have to thank you for my life, Monsieur the peasant," the stranger said, and held out his hand. "Moreover, it is seldom that a prophecy is so quickly fulfilled. You said a few minutes ago that you should one day do a thing worth while for a Bonaparte. You have done it. You have saved my life."

Francois' hand crept to his cap and he pulled it off and stood bareheaded.

"Monsieur, who are you?" he brought out.

The strange boy's vanishing smile brightened his face a second. "I am Louis Bonaparte," he said quietly.

The little court of three stood about the young Prince, silent. And in a moment, in a few sentences, he had told them how, the day before, he had been seized with a hunger for the air of France, which he had not breathed since, as a boy of seven, his mother had escaped with him from Paris during the Hundred Days. He told them how the desire to stand on French soil had possessed him, till at last he had run away from his tutor and had found the path from his exiled home, the castle of Arenenberg, in the canton of Thurgovie, in Switzerland, over the mountains into the Jura valley.

"It is imprudent," he finished the tale calmly. "The government would turn on all its big engines in an uproar to catch one schoolboy, if it was known. But I had to do it." He threw back his head and filled his lungs with a great breath. "The air of France," he whispered in an ecstasy.

For two hours more they told stories and played games through the soft old ruins of the savage old stronghold, as light-heartedly, as carelessly as if there were no wars or intrigues or politics or plots which had been and were to be close to the lives of all of them. Till, as the red round sun went down behind the mountain of the Rose, Francois' quick eye caught sight of a figure swinging rapidly down the mountain road where the Prince had come.

"But look, Louis," he called from behind the rock where he was preparing, as a robber baron, to swoop down on Prince Louis convoying Alixe as an escaped nun to Pietro's monastery in another corner.

And the boy Prince, suddenly grave, shaded his eye with his hand and gazed up the mountain. Then his hand fell and he sighed. "The adventure is over," he said. "I must go back to the Prince business. It is Monsieur Lebas."

Monsieur Lebas, the tutor, arrived shortly in anything but a playful humor. The boy's mother, Queen Hortense, was in Rome, and he was responsible; he had been frightened to the verge of madness by the prince's escapade.

The playmates were separated swiftly. Monsieur Lebas refused with something like horror the eager suggestion that he and his charge should spend the night at the chateau. The Prince must be gotten off French ground without a moment's delay.

CHAPTER X.

The Promise.

"Mon Dieu!" said the general.

It was six years later. At the new chateau not a blade of grass seemed changed. The general stood in the midst of close-cropped millions of blades of grass as he stopped short on the sloping lawn which led down to the white stone steps which led to the sunken garden. Alixe, in her riding habit, with a feather in her hat, and gauntleted gloves on her hands, was so lovely as to be startling. She looked at the ground, half shy, half laughing, and beat the grass with her riding-whip. Francois was leaning toward her and talking, and the general, coming slowly down the lawn, felt a flood of pride rise in him as he looked at this successful picture of a boy which he had done so much to fashion. The two had been riding together, and Francois appeared, as most men do, at his best in riding clothes. With that, as the general marched slowly down the velvet slope, unseen by them, regarding them his girl and his boy, this happy sister and brother—with that the brother lifted his sister's hand and, bending over it, kissed it slowly, in a manner unmistakably unbrotherly.

"Mon Dieu!" gasped the general, and turned on his heel and marched back to his library.

All that afternoon he stayed shut up in the library. At dinner he was taciturn.

The next morning the general sent for Francois to come to him in the library. A letter had been brought a short time before and was lying open on the table by his hand.

"Francois," began the general in his deep abrupt tones, "I am in trouble. Will you help me?"

"Yes, my Seigneur," said Francois quickly.

The general glared at him, frowning. "We shall see," he said again, and then—suddenly as a shot from a cannon—"Does Alixe love you, Francois?"

"I—I think not, my Seigneur," he answered in a low voice.

"I am hurting you," the deep voice said—and only one or two people in the world had heard that voice so full of tenderness. "I am hurting my son. But listen, Francois. It was the dearest wish of Pietro's father—it has been my dearest wish for years—that Alixe and Pietro should one day be married. It is that which would be the crown of a friendship forged in the fires of battle-fields, tempered in the freezing starving snow fields of Russia, finished—I hope never finished for all eternity."

Francois, his head bent, his eyes on the general's hand which held his, answered very quietly. "I see," he said.

"You would not take her from Pietro, who, I am sure, loves her?"

Francois looked up sharply, but the general did not notice. He spoke slowly. "I promised Pietro's father"—the boy seemed to be out of breath—"to be Pietro's friend—always," he said.

The general smiled then and let the fingers go, and turned to the letter on the table before him. "Good!" he said. "You are always what I wish, Francois," and it was quite evident that the load was off his mind.

CHAPTER XI.

With All My Soul.

The general swung around to the lad. "Francois, this letter is about you." He tapped the rustling paper. "Pietro wants you to come to him as his secretary."

Francois' large eyes lifted to the general's face, inquiring, startled, childlike. "Pietro!" he said slowly. "I had not thought of that."

"Yet you knew that Pietro was heart and soul in the plots of the Italian patriots?"

"Yes."

"But you had not thought of going to help him fight?"

"No, my seigneur. I had thought only of the fight for which I must be ready here."

"This Italian business will be good practice," said the general, as a man of today might speak of a tennis tournament. "And you and Pietro will be enchanted to be together again."

Francois smiled, and something in the smile wrung the general's heart.

"Francois, you are not going to be unhappy about little Alixe?"

Quickly Francois threw back, as if he had not heard the question: "My Seigneur, I will go to Pietro; it will be the best thing possible—action and training, and good old Pietro for a comrade. My Seigneur, may I go tomorrow?"

"Tomorrow!" The general was startled now. "A thousand thunders, but you are a sudden lad! Yet it will be no harder to give you up tomorrow than it would be next month. Yes, tomorrow, then, let it be."

Francois stood up, slim, young, alert and steady, yet somehow not as the boy who had come in to the general an hour before; more, perhaps, as a man who had been through a battle and come out very tired, with the noise of the fighting in his ears.

"I will go to the farm tonight, to my mother and my father. And this afternoon I will ride with Alixe, if you do not want me for the book, my Seigneur—and if she will go. May I ask you not to tell Alixe of this—to leave it to me to tell her?"

"Yes," agreed the general doubtfully. "But you will be careful not to—upset her, Francois?"

"I will be careful."

"And—and you will do what you can to help Pietro, will you not, my son?"

A quick contraction twisted Francois' sensitive mouth and was gone, but this time the general saw. "You may trust me, my Seigneur," the boy said, and moved to the door; but the general called to him as his hand touched the latch.

"Francois!"

"Yes, my Seigneur." He faced about, steady and grave, and stood holding the door.

"Francois, my son—I have not hurt you—very much? You do not love Alixe—deeply? Do you love her, Francois?"

There was a shock of stillness in the old dim library. Through the window—where the children's shouts had come in ten years before to the marquis and the general—one heard now in the quiet the sudden staccato of a late cricket. The general, breathing anxiously, looked at Francois, Francois standing like a statue. The general repeated his question softly, breathlessly. "Do you love her, Francois?"

With that the great eyes blazed and the whole face of the boy lighted as if a fire had flamed inside a lantern. He threw back his head.

"With all my soul," he said. "And forever."

* * * * * * * *

A rushing mountain stream—white-veiled in the falling, black-brown in the foam-flecked pools—tumbled, splashed, brawled down the mountain; the mountain hung over, shadowy; banks of fern held the rampant brook in chains of green. Alixe and Francoise, riding slowly in the coolness of the road below, looked up and saw it all, familiar, beautiful, full of old associations.

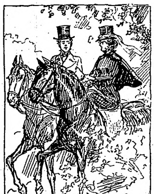
"One misses Pietro," Francois said. "He always wanted to ride past the 'Trou du Gouverneur.'"

A Roman legend had given this name to the deep pool of the brook by the road; it was said that the cruel old governor had used it, two thousand years back, for drowning refractory peasants. Alixe gazed steadily at the dark murmuring water.

"Yes, one misses him. Is life like that, do you suppose, Francois? One grows up with people, and they get to be as much a part of living as the air, or one's hands—and then, suddenly, one is told that they are going away. And that ends it. One must do without air, without hands. What a world, Francois!"

"We are not meant to like it too much, I believe, Alixe," said Francois sunnily. "It is just en passant, this world, when you stop to consider. This is school, this life, I gather. My mother says it is not very important if one has a good seat in the schoolroom or a bad; if one sits near one's playmates or is sent to another corner, so long as one is a good child and works heartily at one's lessons. It is only for a day—and then we go home, where all that is made right. Not a bad idea of my mother's, is it, Alixe?"

"Your mother is a wonderful woman," Alixe answered thoughtfully. "She lives like that. She never let things trouble her, not even when your father lost everything. Did she, Francois?"



Alixe Turned Sharply.

"No," said Francois. "She is one of the few people who know what the real things are and live in them. It is hard to do that. I can not. I care so bitterly for what I want. "It is"—Francois hesitated—"it is very hard for me to give up—what I want." He stumbled over the words; his voice shook so that Alixe shifted in the saddle and looked at him inquiringly.

"Alixe — dear" — then Francois stopped. "You need not be afraid that I shall have more than Pietro," he began uncertainly. "For it is not going to be so. He will have what—what I would give my life for." Then he hurried on. "I see how it is," he said gently, "and you are right to care so loyally for Pietro. He is worth it. And you must never care less, Alixe—never forget him because he has gone away. He will come back." The boy spoke with effort, slowly, but Alixe was too much occupied with her own tumultuous thoughts to notice. "He will surely come back and—belong to you more than ever. He will come back distinguished and covered with honors, perhaps, and then—and then—Alixe, do you see the chestnut tree at the corner that turns to the chateau? It is a good bit of soft road—we will race to that tree—shall we? And then I will tell you something."

The horses raced merrily; Alixe sat close to the saddle with the light swinging seat, the delicate hand on the bridle, which were part of her perfect horsemanship, and over and over as he watched her ride Francois said to himself:

"I will give my happiness for the Seigneur's—I said it, and I will. I will be a friend to Pietro always—I said it, and I will."

Over and over the horses' flying feet pounded out that self-command, and at length the music of the multiplying hoof beats grew slower, and with tightening rein they drew in and stopped under the big chestnut. Alixe was laughing, exhilarated, lovely.

"Wasn't it a good race? Didn't they go deliciously?" she threw at him. And then, "We will go around by the Delesmontes Road; it is only three miles farther, and it is early in the afternoon; there is nothing to do."

Francois spoke slowly. "I am afraid—I must not, Alixe. I am going to the farm tonight."

"To the farm!" Alixe looked at him in surprise. "But you were not to go over till tomorrow. My father and I will ride over with you. Have you forgotten?"

"No," said Francois, "I have not forgotten—no, indeed. But I am going away tomorrow, Alixe."

"Going away?" Alixe turned sharply, and her deep blue glance searched his eyes. "What do you mean, Francois?" And then, imperiously: "Don't tease me, Francois! I don't like it."

Francois steadied, hardened his face very carefully, and answered: "I am not teasing you, Alixe. I did not tell you before because—" he stopped, for his voice was going wrong—"because I thought we would have our ride just as usual today. I only knew about it myself this morning. I am going to Pietro."

"Going—to Pietro!" Alixe was gasping painfully. "Francois—it is a joke—tell me it is a poor joke. Quick!" she ordered. "I won't have you play with me, torture me!"

"It is not a joke." The boy's eyes were held by a superhuman effort on the buckle of the bridle-rein lying on his knee. "There was a letter from Pietro this morning. The seigneur wishes me to go. I wish to go. I go tomorrow."

"Going tomorrow!" The girl's voice was a wail. "You—taken away from me!" Then in a flash: "I hate Pietro! He is cruel—he thinks only of himself. He wants you—but I want you too. How can I live without you, Francois?" Then softly, hurriedly, while the world reeled about the boy, sitting statue-like in his saddle: "It is just as I said. You are as much a part of my life as the air I breathe—and you and my father and Pietro say quite calmly, 'The air is to be taken away—you must do without it.' I can not. I will choke!" She pulled at her collar suddenly, as if the choking were a physical present fact.

No slightest motion, no shade of inflection missed Francois; still he sat motionless, his eyes on the little brass buckle, his lips set in a line, without a word, without a look toward her. And suddenly Alixe, with another quick blue glance from under her long lashes—Alixe, hurt, reckless, desperate, had struck her horse a sharp blow—and she was in the road before him, galloping away.

He let her go. He sat quiet a long time. As she turned in, still galloping, at the high stone gateway of the chateau, his eyes came back again to the little shining buckle. It seemed the only thing tangible in a dream-universe of rapture and agony. Over and over he heard the words she had said—words which must mean—what? Had they meant it? Had he possibly been mistaken? No—the utter happiness which came with the memory of the soft hurried voice must mean the truth—she cared for him, and then over and over and over he said, half aloud, through his set teeth:

"I said that I would give my happiness for my seigneur's; I said that I would be a friend to Pietro; I will."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Home, Sweet Home.

A well known player was talking about a brilliant but unsuccessful disciple of Blackstone.

"His habits are to blame for his failure," said he. "One of his remarks illustrates his habits well. He said to me in the Union club:

"'There's no place like home—especially at 2 or 3 a. m., when you've exhausted the pleasures of all the other places, and you're tired, and everything shut up anyway.'"

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

Thief River Falls now have a very efficient police force with Chief Berge, and James Farr as captain.

Bemidji will vote on the license question and the elimination of all Socialists as holders of any public office, at their February city election.

Sam Iverson is entitled to the solid support of the voters of this state, who are opposed to the re-election of Eberhart, as he is the only candidate that stands any show of defeating the present incombatant, and if he does not win the nomination he will be second in the race by a big majority,

The Thief River Falls council will hire an expert accountant to check up the city clerk's books so as to have them cleaned up to January 1st, the time the new council came in, as the past administration was under the management of the socialist party. Probably they will not find anything wrong, only lack of ability to properly conduct the business.

W. E. Lee the Long Prairie statesman will again try to be governor of Minnesota. Of course the way candidates are now lined up, this will be very favorable news to the present governor, who undoubtedly smiles everytime a new candidate springs up and gives him a first class roasting. Who will be next? There had ought to be at least six candidates to run against Eberhart, for with less than that number he might have to do a little campaigning himself,

Opposition to the re-election of governor Eberhart this year will be so strong and bitter that there will be five or six run against him. Of course a majority of the voters will be against him but the plurality will be for him, so Adolph can continue to ride around and smoke his cigars at the expense of the state for life, if the fool killer does not happen to visit Minnesota, for we all know that a fool can't learn anything by experience; The governor situation this year is a repetition of that two years ago mix up, and there is no doubt but what it will be the same two years hence; if the fool killer don't happen to visit the state,

---

The United States commissioner of immigration in Montreal estimates two hundred thousand people who emigrated from the United States to Canada will return to their native land this year. His statistics show also that a hundred and fifty thousand returned to this country from Canada in 1913. So it is apparent that the rush from the United States to Canada is over, and that the tide is turned.—Duluth Herald.

The U S Department of Agriculture has just compiled the United States crop report. Taking a group of the ten leading western agricultural states, Minnesota has beaten them all in corn, oats, rye and potatoes, and is a close second and third in everything else. The fact that Minnesota has not only beaten, but badly beaten the old original corn states Iowa, Illinois and Indiana in the production of that very important crop is of more than passing significance. It has established the fact that Minnesota is a corn state, and our splendid production this year is something that we can be proud of. The total corn crop in Minnesota was ninety six million bushels being 23,000,000 bushels larger than our wheat crop, and nearly equal to our crop of oats. Minnesota corn averaged 40 bushels per acre while Iowa's average was 34, Illinois 27 and Nebraska 15. —Norman County Index.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate. I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th. 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion, should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities,

Yours very truly,
C L. HANSON,
Thief River Falls, Minn.

ALWAYS FOR MINNESOTA.

(Owatonna Tribune.)

During his years of official service Sam Iverson has followed the text "All for Minnesota and Minnesota for All." A mighty good text, don't you think so? And a man who follows that instead of following the trail of the lonesome fair (street or county of course,) would make a pretty efficient governor.

Scores of the papers of the state are lining up in support of Samuel Iverson for governor and it really appears that this aggressive, square jawed, but jovial official will stand a splendid chance of defeating Eberhart, if other misguided ones do not allow themselves to be dragged into the fight, again dividing the opposition to the present governor.

THE ROBE OF OFFICE.

(Granite Falls Tribune.)

State Auditor Samuel G. Iverson announced his candidacy for governor last week, which was not unexpected nor did it surprise the cabinet now in session. There is probably no better acquainted man in the state, for he has met most people personally during his long occupancy of the capitol and furthermore he promises economy and law enforcement, which sounds good and should be the highest endeavor of all who "wear the robe of office" insofar as they are capable.

WANTED—A RIDER AGENT

IN EACH TOWN and district to ride and exhibit a sample Latest Model "Ranger" bicycle furnished by us. Our agents everywhere are making money fast. Write for full particulars and special offer at once.

NO MONEY REQUIRED until you receive and approve of your bicycle. We ship to anyone anywhere in the U. S. without a cent deposit in advance, prepay freight, and allow TEN DAYS' FREE TRIAL during which time you may ride the bicycle and put it to any test you wish. If you are then not perfectly satisfied or do not wish to keep the bicycle ship it back to us at our expense and you will not be out one cent.

FACTORY PRICES We furnish the highest grade bicycles it is possible to make at one small profit above actual factory cost. You save $10 to $25 middlemen's profits by buying direct of us and have the manufacturer's guarantee behind your bicycle. DO NOT BUY a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone at any price until you receive our catalogues and learn our unheard of factory prices and remarkable special offers to rider agents.

YOU WILL BE ASTONISHED when you receive our beautiful catalogue and study our superb models at the wonderfully low prices we can make you this year. We sell the highest grade bicycles for less money than any other factory. We are satisfied with $1.00 profit above factory cost.

BICYCLE DEALERS, you can sell our bicycles under your own name plate at double our prices. Orders filled the day received.

SECOND HAND BICYCLES. We do not regularly handle second hand bicycles, but usually have a number on hand taken in trade by our Chicago retail stores. These we clear out promptly at prices ranging from $3 to $8 or $10. Descriptive bargain lists mailed free.

COASTER-BRAKES, single wheels, imported roller chains and pedals, parts, repairs and equipment of all kinds at half the regular retail prices.

$10.00 Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof Self-healing Tires A SAMPLE PAIR TO INTRODUCE, ONLY $4.80

The regular retail price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but to introduce we will sell you a sample pair for $4.80 (cash with order $4.55).

NO MORE TROUBLE FROM PUNCTURES

NAILS, Tacks, or Glass will not let the air out. A hundred thousand pairs sold last year.

DESCRIPTION: Made in all sizes. It is lively and easy riding, very durable and lined inside with a special quality of rubber, which never becomes porous and which closes up small punctures without allowing the air to escape. We have hundreds of letters from satisfied customers stating that their tires have only been pumped up once or twice in a whole season. They weigh no more than an ordinary tire, the puncture resisting qualities being given by several layers of thin, specially prepared fabric on the tread. The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.

Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D" also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.

We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires, you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.

IF YOU NEED TIRES don't buy any kind at any price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof tires on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for our big Tire and Sundry Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.

DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it now.

A fall of 6 inches of snow Monday night is making very good sleighing except on the graded roads, where it all blew off into the ditches,

Mr. and Mrs, Clark, Abel Bost, Carl Narveson, and Mr. and Mrs. Hunt and daughter Myrtle visited at the home of Mr, and Mrs. Ljot Sigurdson on saturday evening and a very pleasant evening was spent.

There was some parties drove up here Monday and asked us if we knew of any vacant homestead land, and we told them No but that they might find some down near St. Paul or Chicago.

It is up to the farmers to take hold and push for that Electric line Railroad. If you want to sell your farm it will raise the price of it, and if you expect to continue to farm, it is worth more to you every year than the small amount you invest in it,

The completing of the Electric Railway line 20 miles east of Thief River Falls this summer will put all of the Eleven towns farmers near enough to market so they can make the round trip in one day, which will save a hotel and barn bill to be deducted from the amount received for every load of grain.

The Clearbrook Journal claims that Clearwater county should have the State Senator this year. Why not let one of your candi. dates file for representative Mr. Anderson? You must remember that Pennington County is the biggest voting county in the district which ought to entitle them to the Representative in the upper house of the legislature.

Pennington County are taking an active interest in the Annual Farm Crop Show to be held at Crookston on Feb, 18—19—20, and have deposited their share of cash for the payment of prizes for exhibits of grain. If you have any extra fine samples of wheat, or any other grain send in 10 pounds for exhibition and let them know. Pennington County is a live number and can produce big crops Don't forget the date.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Causin visited at the home of Mr. James O'Brien of Kratka on Sunday.

Miss Myrtle Hunt and Miss Roseella Clark visited with the E. K. Klemmetson girls on Sunday.

Patrons of mail boxes beside the road should place stamps on their letters before putting them into mail boxes, as the mail carrier does not have to pick up loose change out of mail boxes.

It is a big loss of time for a farmer to cut his fire wood with an ax or bucksaw when he can get a gasoline sawing outfit to do it for him that will cut enough wood to last him a year in a few hours.

There is lots of time before spring for some good old fashioned northern Minnesota winter weather, but it has got only about six weeks to go on, before spring will begin to hustle for its turn at the bat.

We received a copy this week of the premium list of the Northwestern Minnesota farm crop show to be held at Crookston, February 18—19—20, and it is a well gotten up one. You can obtain a copy by writing the agricultural school.

We received the announcement and platform of D. P. O'Neil, as candidate for State Senate this week, too late for publication, but it will appear next week, We do not exactly like the idea of there being two candidates from this county, as it looks too much like the governor situation. However go to it gentlemen as it is up to you to win or loose.

We received notice to pay a small assessment to the Farmer's Mutual Insurance Co, of Bray, this week. We have been insured in this company for six years and this is our first assessment, And you bet the money went forward by return mail, as it is the cheapest reliable insurance that we ever struck. They only insure farmers, but the editor W. G. Hunt can tell about the insurance of Wm. G. Hunt the farmer.

A case of local interest was tried in district court in Marshall County last week, in which a farmer sued to recover payment from thrashermen for grain burned that was set on fire while threshing. The jury decided in favor of the defendents the threshermen. W. E. Rows, of Crookston was the attorney for the defendants.

MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RAILWAY,

THE FARMERS RAILWAY,

CHEAP AND RELIABLE TRANSPORTATION FOR ALL PRODUCTS OF THIS TERRITORY.

The Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway Company has commenced the construction of the first division of 20 miles running eastward from Thief River Falls to the Township of Goodridge The company expects to put this 20 miles in operation not later than the First Day of September, 1914. Extensions from the end of the First Division will then be started and placed in operation as soon as possible,

This railway will afford to the farmers of this district the very best of railway service for transporting their products to market. Arrangements have already been made so that it will be possible to load cars at the stations of the Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway and ship these same cars without reloading to any point on any railroad in the United States, without any additional switching or transfer charges. For instance, in accordance with the rates as laid down at the present time by the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of the State of Minnesota, you can ship a carload of 600 bushels of wheat from Grygla to Duluth for only $2.16 more than from Thief River Falls to Duluth.

THE MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RAILWAY WILL BRING THE VERY BEST OF MARKETS. IT WILL INCREASE THE VALUE OF EVERY ACRE OF LAND IN THIS COMMUNITY. IT WILL MAKE FARMING HERE AS PROFITABLE AS IN ANY PART OF THE UNITED STATES.

Every land owner in this community should exert himself to secure this railway and should subscribe for at least one share of stock. The Company asks for no bonus. The stock will pay you a good rate of interest and prove a good investment. You can secure this railway in your immediate vicinity sooner by subscribing for some stock now.

STOCK WILL ONLY BE SOLD FOR THE FIRST TWENTY MILES,

HADN'T A CHANCE TO SHOW

Manager's Excuse for Defeated Fighter About the Limit Recorded in That Line.

Dick Woods, fight manager in the palmy days of Chicago sports, now a business man, told a good one while on his way home from the McFarland-Briton fight in Milwaukee.

"A few years ago an old-time trainer came to me and whispered confidentially that he had a coming champion in the middleweight class," related Woods. "He said he could not be beat.

"'Watch him fight Cyclone Johnny Thompson next week,' he told me. 'He'll wipe him off the map.'

"The fight came off—it was scheduled for six rounds—and the 'hope' was licked in the second round.

"I didn't want to rub it in, but I asked the trainer about the affair the next time I saw him.

"'Oh, my man's all right,' was his breezy explanation, 'only he can't get started in the short battles. He is a twenty-round fighter and the scrap with Thompson was too short.'"

A CLERGYMAN'S TESTIMONY.

The Rev. Edmund Heslop of Wigton, Pa., suffered from Dropsy for a year. His limbs and feet were swollen and puffed. He had heart fluttering, was dizzy and exhausted at the least exertion. Hands and feet were cold and he had such a dragging sensation across the loins that it was difficult to move. After using 5 boxes of Dodds Kidney Pills the swelling disappeared and he felt himself again. He says he has been benefited and blessed by the use of Dodds Kidney Pills. Several months later he wrote: "I have not changed my faith in your remedy since the above statement was authorized. Correspond with Rev. E. Heslop about this wonderful remedy.

Called Home.

A noted clergyman, whose pastorate is in a well-known city, was spending a few days at the summer home of one of his congregation.

While seated on the piazza one afternoon with his hostess, her little boy and girl came running toward them; the former with a rat held at arm's length by the tail.

"Don't be afraid, mother," he called. "It is quite dead! We beat him and beat him!" each declaration being illustrated by an imaginary blow on the rat. Then, feeling a deference might be due the clergyman, he said, in measured, solemn tones and with uplifted eyes:

"Yes, we beat him and beat him until—God—called—him—home."—Harper's Magazine.

SCALP TROUBLE FOR YEARS

268 Harrison St., Elyria, Ohio.—"My case was a scalp trouble. I first noticed small bunches on my scalp which commenced to itch and I would scratch them and in time they got larger, forming a scale or scab with a little pus, and chunks of hair would come out when I would scratch them off. It caused me to lose most of my hair. It became thin and dry and lifeless. I was troubled for over ten years with it until it got so bad I was ashamed to go to a barber to get my hair cut.

"I tried everything I could get hold of, ——— and ———, but received no cure until I commenced using Cuticura Soap and Ointment when the scale commenced to disappear. The way I used the Cuticura Soap and Ointment was to wash my scalp twice a day with warm water and Cuticura Soap and rub on the Cuticura Ointment. I received benefit in a couple of weeks and was cured in two months." (Signed) F. J. Busher, Jan. 28, 1913.

DOCTORING A PROFITLESS FARM

By GEORGE H. DACY

Preparing the Ground by Taking Out All the Old Roots.

IF you were a countryman whose farm was not paying very well and an agricultural expert came along and said: "Let me show you how you can double and triple your present income;" if the man looked sane and intelligent, you would doubtless jump at the chance.

Furthermore, if he made good on his assertion he would win your everlasting gratitude and perhaps you would recompense him with a little cash bonus. Now this is just the opportunity that the farm management department of the Missouri Agricultural college is offering to the farmers of the "show me" state.

The department says: "Ask for our aid and we will show you how to tonic your sickly bank accounts and how to increase the profits of every branch of your farm." Even the most skeptical who, to begin with, made fun of the proposition have been silenced because the Missouri farm management department has made good on all its assertions.

Today some 500 local farmers are annually recording greater profits on the credit side of their ledgers as a result of following the advice and plans mapped out for them by the department.

An experiment in growing cow peas with corn on one of the demonstration farms. The peas will fatten from six to 10 western lambs at a profit of $10 per acre.

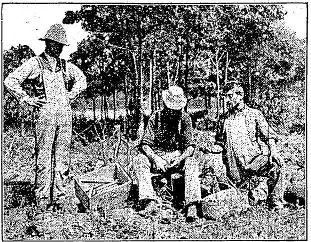
The department was organized in 1906 under the direction of Prof. W. J. Spillman of the United States department of agriculture, and F. B. Mumford, dean of the Missouri Agricultural college. For four years its work was confined to an accurate study of local farm conditions—a resume of the knotty problems of the Missouri farmer and how he could be best aided in solving them.

Then when the force was thoroughly conversant with the "star boarder" farms of the state and had planned an efficient campaign whose object was to eradicate the evil features of the unprofitable farm, they offered to help the general farmer re-map his system of management, his crop rotations, his methods of marketing his produce, and to adapt his line of farming to the region in which he resided.

Confidence in Organization Grows.

It was a case of "first come, first served," and after these business management doctors had cured a few severe cases of "loafer" farms and made them profitable and more productive, applications requesting aid came in like hot cakes from countrymen in all portions of the state.

As an illustration of what these expert farm managers could accomplish in rehabilitating a good farm which was run down, due to mismanagement, take the case of "Jim" Brown, who was considered one of the best farmers in his district; yet he, on the quiet, appealed to the department for aid.



Removing With Dynamite Some of the Largest Roots.

A representative visited the farm and found it apparently in good condition, supplied with good buildings, and annually yielding bumper crops of grain and roughage, 30 bushels of wheat, 60 bushels of corn and two tons of hay to the acre.

It was a different story, however, when the expert examined the live stock. The dairy cows were scrubs of the worst variety, with staring coats and every rib showing, and with udders not larger than a man's two fists.

The swine and horses were also inferior specimens of twentieth century live stock, while the supply of farm machinery was in no sense modern and efficient. Here was a case of a countryman who was exerting all his energies toward the production of profitable crops, only to feed them to unprofitable live stock.

From 12 cows he obtained only enough milk to supply the need of his family of six persons. The department showed him where the leak was, and explained to him how he could harmonize all his operations and render his farm more fertile and profitable by maintaining better live stock. He acceded to their advice and today is gaining a profitable livelihood and yearly fattening his bank account under a standardized system of management.

Farmers Take Kindly to the Plan.

The popularity of this movement to rejuvenate sick farms increased to such an extent that a year ago the department organized the Missouri Farm Management association, the pioneer society of its character in America, the members being recruited from among the ranks of the owners of unprofitable farms who desired to nurse all the operations on their acreages back to a wage-earning condition.

The object of this association was to organize and combine the farmers of Missouri who were interested in practical system of farm management. It aided the department in so much as the countrymen who needed and wanted help were centralized in the organization, while it aided the farmers in so far as the department experts promised to visit and replan each place in turn. Two hundred earnestly interested farmers joined the society the first year, while at present the enrollment is double that number. Each countryman pays $1.25 membership fee—the funds being used to aid the department in its work.

Farmers Co-Operate With Department.

After his farm has been inspected by the department, in case a member of the society follows out the suggestions of the experts (although he is not in any way bound to carry out these suggested changes) he becomes a co-operator. The majority of the co-operators adhere strictly to the advice of the department.

Each year the department selects the best co-operative farm in each county and makes it a demonstration farm which conducts local experimental work under the direction of the experts. In the case of the demonstration farm, the department assumes the initiative and devotes as much attention to the place as is necessary to make it pre-eminently successful, and spares no pains in assisting the operators of these farms to bring them to the highest possible state of fertility and to the maximum point of profitableness.

On the other hand, co-operator must take the initiative in all phases of his work, although he receives aid and assistance from the department experts when he stumbles onto a knotty problem. At present there are 75 co-operative and five demonstration farms in the state, and each summer, public meetings are held on the places of the demonstrators, where typical and illustrative results have been obtained.

Farmers from all parts of the country are invited to attend these meetings at which prominent agricultural experts and authorities on farm management discuss the various lines of farming practiced in Missouri. At noon, a basket lunch is served by the ladies of the county in which the gathering is held, and in the afternoon the men visit each individual field, study the crop, and informally discuss the efficiency of the methods of seed bed preparation, planting and cultivation which have been practiced in the development of this crop.

These meetings have been fittingly termed "Show Me Institutes on Legs," and are really regular motion picture shows minus the nickel.

Woman's Work Included in "Doctoring."

While the men are busy with their field study, their wives under the direction of an expert in home economics occupy themselves with the problems of the farmhouse. Efficient methods of replanning the home, home decoration, modern methods of cookery, the elimination of wastes and the utilization of byproducts, handy aids in the kitchen, and the beautification of the farm yard are explained and discussed in detail.

The woman expert in charge of this work occupies herself throughout the year in visiting and remapping the systems of home-management practiced by the housewives who request her aid. She is a sort of a traveling home economics department which works according to the theory that if you cannot bring the farmer's wife to the college then take the college and science to the kitchen of the housewife.

Getting Things Ready.

She plans out the management of each home as practically and systematically as the home pocketbook will permit.

The Missouri farm management department also maintains a farm accounting branch which teaches the state farmers how to maintain a practical and business-like system of records and accounts.

One Missouri farmer last winter lost $300 on work stock alone, due to the fact that he had more animals than he could keep busy. It is really a question of each farmer studying out how many head of animals he can profitably maintain, and then not exceeding this number. The same thing is true of the scrub cows which eat up the profits of the other farm departments.

The work of the Missouri farm management department is state-wide in scope and is efficient in solving the problems of the five-acre farm, the 500-acre farm, or the farm whose owner merely desires to keep the wolf from the door, or to save his place from being burdened with a mortgage.

In a word, the department is devoting just as much attention and study to replanting an unprofitable ten-acre truck or fruit farm as it is to remodeling an 8,000-acre stock farm.

The Concrete Examples.

Among the practical results which the department has obtained in its first aid work to the farmers is the case of a 140-acre farm which, the first year it was worked, yielded ten bushels of corn, 15 bushels of potatoes, and one-fourth of a ton of hay to the acre.

The managerial experts recommended the use of better seed, the fall distribution of 15 tons of manure to the acre, and modern methods of culture; this farmer followed these directions and the second year afterwards he harvested 40 bushels of corn, one and three-quarter tons of hay, and 100 bushels of potatoes to the acre on the fields on which these crops were grown.

He was a man of very limited capital and the season he requested departmental assistance his assets amounted to $2,000, while his liabilities totaled $1,800. At the end of the second year following, he was out of all danger of debt and had a tiny sum stored away in the bank.

Another notable illustration of managerial efficiency resulted where a hog raiser on a rough, 100-acre farm shifted his troubles to the shoulders of the expert managers who set him right on his feeding system and got him to study market conditions and requirements, so that he last year realized $1,200 from the sale of his swine, whereas previously his high mark for hogs for a single year was $500.

Although ordinary work stock are not supposed to yield much of an annual profit another farmer cleared $300 in one year from his work animals subsequent to consulting with the departmental experts who advised him to decrease the number of work animals which he kept and to work the horses and mules more during the winter.

A city man, inexperienced in farming, struggled along for five years just about making ends meet and then he employed the assistance of the farm experts who diagnosed his troubles as a poor rotation, the use of scrub seed, and the under-feeding of his market animals.

He followed their directions, improving his methods, and now is gaining a profitable return from his made-to-order farm.

The farm has materially gained in fertility, it has increased in annual crop production, and this year it paid off its back indebtedness and begins a new season with a clean slate.

Indian Legend of Interest.

When the Creek or Muskogee Indians adopted into their tribe the remnants of other tribes which were nearly extinct many superstitions were found among them. One of these tribes was the Tuckabatches. The legends of the Creeks state that the Tuckabatches brought with them seven plates, the origin and object of which have puzzled scientific men for centuries. The Tuckabatches claim that these plates were given them by their ancestors. They were not to be handled by all persons, only by particular men, and those chosen by the chief or micco of the tribe. Five of the plates were of copper and two of brass. The copper plates were about 18 inches long and seven inches wide; the brass ones being round and 18 inches in diameter, having two characters on them similar to the letters A and E connected. The plates were kept buried under the house of the chief and are believed to be still in existence.—Tallaquah (Okla.) Democrat.

DIZZY, HEADACHY, SICK, "CASCARETS"

Gently cleanse your liver and sluggish bowels while you sleep.

Get a 10-cent box.

Sick headache, biliousness, dizziness, coated tongue, foul taste and foul breath—always trace them to torpid liver; delayed, fermenting food in the bowels or sour, gassy stomach.

Poisonous matter clogged in the intestines, instead of being cast out of the system is re-absorbed into the blood. When this poison reaches the delicate brain tissue it causes congestion and that dull, throbbing, sickening headache.

Cascarets immediately cleanse the stomach, remove the sour, undigested food and foul gases, take the excess bile from the liver and carry out all the constipated waste matter and poisons in the bowels.

A Cascaret to-night will surely straighten you out by morning. They work while you sleep—a 10-cent box from your druggist means your head clear, stomach sweet and your liver and bowels regular for months. Adv.

HELD REPROOF IN MEMORY

Chiding to Child, That Seemed Unkind, Later Nerved Man to Deed of Heroism.

Dr. Keate, the terrible head master of Eton, encountered one winter morning a small boy crying miserably, and asked him what was the matter. The child replied that he was cold. "Cold!" roared Keate. "You must put up with cold, sir! You are not at a girls' school."

It is a horrid anecdote, and I am kind-hearted enough to wish that Dr. Keate, who was not without his genial moods, had taken the lad to some generous fire (presuming such a thing was to be found) and had warmed his frozen hands and feet. But it so chanced that in that little sniveling boy there lurked a spark of pride and a spark of fun, and both ignited at the rough touch of the master. He probably stopped crying, and he certainly remembered the sharp appeal to manhood; for fifteen years later, with the Third dragoons, he charged at the strongly intrenched Sikhs (30,000 of the best fighting men of the Khalsa) on the curving banks of the Sutlej. And as the word was given he turned to his superior officer, a fellow Stonian who was scanning the stout walls and the belching guns. "As old Keate would say, this is no girls' school," he chuckled, and rode to his death on the battlefield of Sobraon, which gave Lahore to England.—Agnes Repplier, in the Atlantic.

Where Twins Are a Disgrace.

A special study of the women of the Ibibios and other southern Nigerian tribes has been made by Mrs. P. Amaury Talbot, who, with her husband and sister, has just completed a 4,300-mile journey in West Africa.

Though many of the invocations of the people are addressed to the powers of fertility and a large family is a native ideal, the birth of twins is considered a disgrace. One of the twins is regarded as a devil's child. Outside the sphere of British influence twins are generally killed at birth. The husband forsakes the wife and she must spend at least a year in "Twin Town," isolated with other women in like case, and take part in purifying rites. If he please the husband may then rejoin her.

The Secret.

"Did you notice the great quantity of diamonds Anna is wearing?"

"Yes. She said her father blew himself for them."

"He probably did. Her father is a glassblower, I understand."—Judge.

WONDERED WHY.

Found the Answer Was "Coffee."

Many pale, sickly persons wonder for years why they have to suffer so, and eventually discover that the drug—caffeine—in coffee is the main cause of the trouble.

"I was always very fond of coffee and drank it every day. I never had much flesh and often wondered why I was always so pale, thin and weak.

"About five years ago my health completely broke down and I was confined to my bed. My stomach was in such condition that I could hardly take sufficient nourishment to sustain life.

"During this time I was drinking coffee, didn't think I could do without it.

"After awhile I came to the conclusion that coffee was hurting me, and decided to give it up and try Postum. When it was made right—dark and rich—I soon became very fond of it.

"In one week I began to feel better. I could eat more and sleep better. My sick headaches were less frequent, and within five months I looked and felt like a new being, headache spells entirely gone.

"My health continued to improve and today I am well and strong, weigh 148 lbs. I attribute my present health to the life-giving qualities of Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

COUNTY AGENT IS PEOPLE'S SERVANT

STEVENS COUNTY FARM BUREAU CLASSIFIES WORK OF SPECIAL OVERSEER.

ORGANIZATIONS COLLABORATE

Movement Is Considered Quite Significant and No Doubt Exists as to Value of Expert Assistance.

Hancock.—At a meeting of the board of directors of the Stevens county farm bureau, held at this place, the relation of the county agricultural agent to the people of the county was discussed at length.

The reason for the discussion is found in the fact that in spite of all that has been said of the work of the county agent there is much misunderstanding as to his place in the scheme of agricultural betterment. A great many, in fact, have the impression that a county agent is a man in some manner connected with the United States government, whose duty it is to collect statistics and other agricultural information in order to hand it on to Washington, like the facts and figures turned in by the census man. This is a wholly mistaken notion, and this fact was emphasized at the meeting here.

Who Agent Is.

The county agent, it was pointed out, was the man between the federal government's agricultural bureau and the state's educational and experimental forces on the one hand and the people on the other, to make national and state research in agriculture available to the people of the farms. He is also to serve as a carrier of information of value from farm to farm—information having to do with the bettering of farming and country life.

To aid him, however, in shooting at single birds rather than at random into whole flocks, the county farm bureau has an important position. The bureau through its directors considers the special needs of its territory, and works through the county agent to meet these needs, the agent being in the position of servant of the people.

As a result of these conclusions, the directors of the Stevens county farm bureau appointed a committee of three to collaborate with the county agent, taking up the special needs of the county, such as the furthering of corn growing on the soundest basis, the elimination of weed pests, the growing of alfalfa, and so on.

Value of Work Certain.

This movement on the part of the Stevens county farm bureau is significant. There is no longer any doubt of the value of the work of the county agent. But Stevens county wishes to get the highest degree of efficiency, and realizes that to do so the county agent must have well organized assistance and direction. In other words, the valuable information as to methods and practice available from nation and state must be brought to bear, not in a general way, but in a particular way to specific problems for the whole of a county as well as to the special problems of the individual farmer. The farm bureau can be of immense help here, and help to place the county agent's services more fully at the disposal of the people. The county agent problem is thus in process of solution. It is all summed up in this: How to make him the most efficient servant of the people of the farms and of the towns in relation to the farms.

Maniac With Butcher Knife.

Albert Lea.—Albert Mucha, a farmer, became violently insane and arming himself with a butcher knife and a shotgun drove his wife and children from home and spread consternation among his neighborhood. Deputy Sheriff Fosse of this city was notified and the man was captured and brought to this city, where he was adjudged insane and taken to Rochester.

Big Stone to Have Plant.

Ortonville.—This city has agreed to furnish the residents of Big Stone City, S. D., with electricity. The current will be delivered to the state line, which is about half way, at a fixed rate and the city of Big Stone is to assume all the expenses in wiring and for the general up-keep. The cost of installation is estimated at $8,000.

Farmers to Do Own Shipping.

New Ulm.—More than one hundred farmers of Lafayette township have organized a co-operative shipping association, the second of its kind in Nicollet county. The meeting was addressed by S. S. Beach of the extension division of the University of Minnesota, who told of the advantages of such organizations. Henning Johnson was elected president and Andrew Jacobson secretary and treasurer. L. W. Samuelson was appointed to act as buyer for the new company.

J. P. CHARGED WITH THREATS

Haled Into Court for Attempting to Coerce an Alleged Game Law Violator.

Grand Rapids.—Justice of the Peace W. J. Trescott at Coleraine was brought before Justice Charles Kearney here to answer to a complaint of having, by threats, coercion and intimidation, attempted to "compel another to do an act which he had a legal right to abstain from doing."

The complainant is A. Rosen of Hibbing, who says he received a letter from Trescott stating that Game Warden J. E. Cummings had found muskrat skins in the possession of Rosen and that if the latter would come to Coleraine and plead guilty he would be let off with a fine of $20 and costs, but that if he failed to put in an appearance at the court of Trescott the fines and costs would aggregate about $20 more than the first-named sum.

The justice's communication to complainant also stipulated a time at which the latter must come forward and make settlement under pain of having the village marshal of Coleraine come and arrest him.

At the hearing, Trescott was allowed to go on his own recognizances inasmuch as a member of his family is very ill. He disclaims any intent of wrong-doing, and says he was only attempting to save Rosen needless expense.

TO PREVENT FOREST FIRE

T. B. Walker, Pioneer Minnesota Lumberman, Scores Methods Used at Present.

St. Paul.—"Reforestation of the Minnesota timber lands is impossible, the conservation policy is taxed out of existence and the government methods of fire prevention in the great timber regions of California and the West are a futile attempt to control the fire waste," T. B. Walker, pioneer Minnesota lumberman and millionaire, declared before the annual meeting of the Minnesota Historical society at the Capitol.

"The government system of picketing the forests of the West to prevent fires is folly," he said. "It permits the pine needles and the undergrowth to accumulate so that a fire soon will sweep that region the like of which never before has been seen.

"The picket policy will result in a series of the most disastrous fires ever known.

"To prevent this loss to the country, I have suggested slow burning of the undergrowth rather than the strict prevention of all the little fires that occur.

"The accumulated undergrowth becomes a terrible menace when one knows that 70 per cent of the forest fires is caused by lightning."

SOUTHERN TEACHERS TO MEET

Association Convention at Mankato Will be Addressed by Dr. C. H. Judd, of Chicago University.

Mankato.—The preliminary program of the annual meeting of the Southern Minnesota Teachers' association, which is to be held in this city Feb. 12, 13 and 14, has been prepared by the executive committee.

The convention will open the evening of Feb. 12, when the superintendents and principals will have a round table. On the morning of Feb. 13, general sessions will open and President F. A. Colton of the La Crosse state normal school will deliver an address. In the afternoon sectional meetings of both graded and high schools will be held.

In the evening, Dr. C. H. Judd, director of the school of education of the University of Chicago, will address a general session of the convention. The closing session will be held the forenoon of Feb. 14, when officers will be elected.

Rail Officials Are Advanced.

Winona.—Notices were received at the North-Western railway offices here of the advancement of three officials, all of whom have held positions in the superintendent's office. William Walliser, who was transferred to the superintendency at Belle Blaine, Iowa, some time ago after leaving Winona, has been appointed assistant to the general managers of the system both east and west of the Missouri river, with headquarters at Chicago. W. D. Beck, who was superintendent here about ten years ago, has been made superintendent of the passenger terminals at Chicago. B. E. Terpening, former assistant superintendent here, has taken the position of Superintendent Walliser at Belle Plaine.

St. Cloud Bank Is Prosperous.

St. Cloud.—The regular annual meeting of the stockholders of the First National bank was held and the regular semi-annual dividend of 5 per cent declared and $10,000 added to undivided profits. The institution will become a member of the federal reserve association under the new currency law and will be the first in this section to become affiliated with the association. The following officers were elected: President, R. O. Olson; vice president, W. W. Smith; cashier, W. W. Smith.

MOTHER GETS CHILD BACK

Secures 7 Year Old Boy by Court Writ—Will Now Contest Will of Husband.

Fergus Falls.—Armed with a writ of habeas corpus, Sheriff Billings went to Battle Lake to get Paul Anderson, a boy of 7, and bring him before the district court in this city in order to have his legal status determined. The writ was secured by the boy's mother, Mrs. Florence Anderson, who had come from Seattle to secure him.

The parents were married in St. Paul several years ago. The boy's father, Hans C. Anderson, was older than his mother, and had children by a former marriage. They went to the state of Washington to reside.

A year or two ago the father left his home, taking the boy with him, to New Hampshire. There the man was killed by a boiler explosion last fall, and the boy was then taken by Mrs. Halvor Stowe of Battle Lake, this county, Anderson's daughter by a former marriage and the boy's half sister.

The mother was unable to locate them for a long time, and finally employed a detective. She is teaching in Washington, and immediately secured a leave of absence in order to come here and secure the child. The Masonic order of Seattle had taken an interest in her behalf, and she has no lack of credentials. She immediately secured a writ of habeas corpus and accompanied the sheriff to Battle Lake.

The boy was found there and the Stowe family, after talking the matter over, agreed to give him up without a contest and the mother returned west with him at once.

Mr. Anderson, before his death, made a will in which he is understood to have disinherited his wife. He was possessed of some property and steps will be taken to contest the will.

LINE EXTENSION IS TALKED

Farmers Will Aid in Pushing Luce Electric Road Beyond Wayzata.

Lake Crystal.—A mass meeting of farmers of Butternut Valley, Cambria, Judson and Lincoln townships, was held at Butternut to consider the proposition for the extension of the Luce electric railway line from Minneapolis and Wayzata, southwest through Sibley, Nicollet and Blue Earth counties, and thence to Fairmont and on south into Iowa.

Vice President E. D. Luce and H. L. Davis of the company spoke, and a committee that had been to Minneapolis to investigate the situation presented a favorable report. The company proposed to pay for its right of way at the rate of approximately $200 an acre.

After a thorough discussion of the matter it was decided to try to raise the necessary stock subscription of $12,000, and a committee was appointed to assist Mr. Davis.

A meeting was held at Nicollet the day before and the matter was considered favorably.

TWO IRON LEASES ARE FILED

Eighty Acres Are Secured By Interstate Company Near Grand Rapids.

Grand Rapids.—The Interstate Iron company have filed a lease for the two forties on which the Fargo mine is located, securing the property for a term of fifty years from the Vermillion Range Land company.

This is one of the properties upon which the Interstate people have had an option and on which exploration work and drilling has been in progress for some time. The land is only a short distance northeast of this place.

Closed Bank Seems Sound.

Barnesville.—C. H. Anheier, national bank examiner with headquarters at Fargo, N. D., arrived here to check over the accounts of the Barnesville National bank, which voluntarily closed its doors last week. According to a statement obtained at the bank the liabilities are given at $20,000 and resources at $54,000. The assets are considered sound. The institution has done business here for twenty-two years.

Mankato Sends Four Convicts.

Mankato.—In the district court, Judge A. R. Pfau sentenced Herman Schmidt and William Wagner to Stillwater prison for grand larceny in the second degree for stealing hides. H. A. Clausen of Hadley, Minn., was sentenced to Stillwater for forging some checks, and John Wilkens was sentenced there for desertion of his wife.

Fire Loss Cut in Two.

St. Paul.—A marked decrease in Minnesota fire losses for December, 1913, as compared with the figures for the same month of the previous year is shown in the December report of C. E. Keller, state fire marshal. The Minneapolis decrease was most noticeable, the loss last month being only $28,000 against $188,000 for the previous December. Mr. Keller shows that the total loss for the state in December was $225,888 or less than half of the loss for December, 1912, which was $479.709.

BACKACHE—RHEUMATISM QUICKLY VANISHES

Even Most Chronic Sufferers Find Relief From Few Doses of Croxone.

Croxone soon relieves such conditions because it reaches the very roots of the disease. It soaks right into the stopped-up, inactive kidneys, through the walls and linings; cleans out the little filtering cells and glands; neutralizes and dissolves the poisonous uric acid substances that lodge in the joints and muscles to scratch and irritate and cause rheumatism; heals the inflamed membranes of the bladder, and cleans out and strengthens the stopped-up, lifeless kidneys so they can filter and sift all the poisons from the blood, and drive it out of the system.

So sure, so positive, so quick and lasting, are the results obtained from the use of Croxone, that three doses a day for a few days are often all that is required to end the worst backache, regulate the most annoying bladder disorders, and overcome the numerous other similar conditions.

Croxone is so prepared that it is practically impossible to take it without results.

An original package costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if Croxone fails to give desired results, regardless of how old you are, how long you have suffered, or what else has failed.—Adv.

Further Use of Radium.

According to recent experiments in Europe radium is instrumental in preventing diseases of plants. For several years workers in agronomic science have been experimenting upon the effect of radium on vegetation by mixing radio-active substances with the usual fertilizers. The numerous results obtained in this work show that most plants, either grain or flower, are remarkably stimulated and give a better yield both in size and quality, this being often seen in the fine and healthy color of the green plants or leaves. The same plants are in better condition to resist attacks from various sources of disease, especially diseases known as cryptogamic, which arise from spores or mold. It seems that radium is to act as a preventive for such diseases as wheat rust, rotting of potatoes, grapevine mildew and many others which cause such detriment to agriculture.

SCORED ON HIS LORDSHIP

Father O'Leary's Apt Remark Put the Situation in a Good Case, So to Speak.

Rev. Father O'Leary was off to catch the Dublin express. On the way to the station he ran into his bishop.

"Well, what's the hurry, O'Leary?" said he.

"Sure, it's the Dublin express I'm after, your lordship."

The bishop pulled out his watch. "Well, there are seven minutes yet; let us walk together and both catch it."

They arrived at the station just in time to see the train steaming out.

"Do you know, I had the greatest faith in that watch, O'Leary," said the bishop.

"Ah! my lord, what is faith without good works?" replied the angry O'Leary.

Not a Flattering Idea.

A noted Sunday school worker, living in Kansas, was once asked to talk to the children of a Sunday school on the subject of temperance. He is very earnest in the cause and wears a bit of blue ribbon as a badge of his principles. Rising before the school, he pointed to his bit of blue ribbon and said: "Now, can any of you children give me a reason why I am not a drunkard?" There was no reply for a moment, then a childish little voice in the rear of the room piped out: "Cause this is a prohibition town."

The Lighthouse of the North

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

Our little yacht cut gaily through the great waves that rolled in an unceasing surge off the great North cape of Norway. It was the end of September; the nights and days were equal, but a blue line on the horizon betokened the approach of the Arctic icepack that would soon descend to seal that silent coast until the following spring. Nothing could exceed the loneliness and desolation of the sea-scape; not a sail or line of smoke was visible. Far on our starboard lay the Norwegian coast.

There were six of us aboard with Nikolai. We were all consumed to know the reason for our presence in those cold waters, far from civilization. This was the day on which we were to be told. Nikolai assembled us on deck—we were all members of the international league—and broke the seal of a document.

Then he read out the orders.

"Satcha Alexandrovitch, with five other revolutionary patriots, is on his way to Archangel aboard the Potemkin," he told us.

Our mission was to rescue them. For these men had been the hope of Russia and of freedom through many stormy months; at last, treacherously betrayed to the minions of the tsar, they had been sentenced, after a mock trial, to perpetual banishment in the frozen wastes of northern Russia, where no man ever lived long enough to communicate with his friends again. It was a sentence of death in the penal settlement there.

And on the following day the cruiser Potemkin would round the great cape on her journey into the White sea, the last before the closing in of the ice, bearing her victims.

Afterward, Nikolai communicated to me his plans, as we sat side by side within the cabin, studying the charts.

"Here we shall intercept her," he said, pointing to a dot off the coast. "And all her guns and complement of soldiers and sailors will never save her."

He unfolded his scheme. "Here is the lighthouse," he said. "Its light, burning steadily, alone makes possible a voyage between those rocks and shoals. We shall destroy the light; the ship, misled, will be buffeted to pieces upon the rocks. The prisoners have been warned. They will escape in the confusion. Perhaps they will perish; but the chance is better than the certain death which awaits them."

It was a desperate undertaking, the little yacht against the armored battleship, but none of us thought of that. Our hearts were elated with the magnitude of our task. That night, running in close along the rocky shore, we sighted the lighthouse.

It was of the old-fashioned type. The lenses did not revolve, but a steady stream of light issued through them on three sides, shooting out like a warning finger far into the darkness.

"We shall shoot out the glasses," I said to Nikolai. "Perchance, if we shoot out the central lense, no light visible from a distance will issue. The Potemkin will sail to her destruction."

Nikolai smiled rather sadly.

"We cannot approach that coast within two thousand yards," he answered. "And, at that distance, no rifle bullet would penetrate those thick lenses. Moreover, at such a distance, who could hit a beam of light by night—or even the lighthouse, by day, clothed, as it always is, with perpetual sea-fogs?"

"What then?" I asked.

"We must take it by storm," he answered. "It is guarded by three soldiers—veterans of the Imperial Guard. Russia leaves little to chance. It must be captured."

That night the lighthouse was to be rushed. There was no other way. At dark we took our way in toward the shore cautiously by means of the lead; we anchored at a distance of a mile and a little more, and leaving two men aboard, the five of us remaining rowed cautiously through the rocks.

More than once our little boat upset, leaving us clinging to the sharp, needle-pointed crags. But each time we recovered ourselves, by some fortuitous miracle. At length, dripping, frozen and utterly exhausted, we reached the rocks on which the great lighthouse stood. It towered above us, a veritable colossus of masonry; and from its summit the steady beams of light poured forth on three sides through the fogs. And now I perceived why my suggestion could not have been carried out. The lenses were set back into the masonry, so that no rifle bullet could have been aimed at them from the base of the cliffs. Only far out at sea would they become accessible, and there, as Nikolai had said, they could not have been pierced.

We had brought cutlasses and revolvers. At a word from Nikolai we crept cautiously across our slippery foothold until we reached the ironbound door at the base of the tower. Faintly within we heard two watchmen singing a peasant song.

"Now, men," said Nikolai, "it will be useless to knock. Nobody will open to the sea, for they know that no person could some here with anything but evil intent." He picked up a huge bowlder, poising it aloft with ease. "Follow me!" he cried, and hurled himself with his burden against the door.

That was the mightiest blow that ever I saw struck. It shivered the oaken timbers from bottom to top. Only the iron bolts restrained the fragments of the door. A moment later and we had cleared away this obstruction, just as two bearded giants stepped along the flags within and confronted us.

"Yield!" cried Nikolai in Russian, covering them with his revolver.

They threw up their hands with alacrity. "Where is your companion?" Nikolai asked.

"In the light chamber," they answered sullenly.

We dashed pell-mell up the stone stairs. We came upon him as he descended; in a twinkling he was disarmed. The lighthouse was ours. It was the work of a few moments to pour out the oil and break the lenses.

"We should have kept those fellows prisoners," said Nikolai. "Still, they can do no harm. They will not dare attack us, and there is nowhere for them to go. Now, men, back to the boat."

We hurried down. As we ran we heard shouts beneath us—defiant, mocking, they seemed. When we reached the ruins of the door below the cries came from the darkness, mingled with the pounding of the surf. Nikolai exclaimed aloud and ran on alone across the slippery rocks. I heard him stumble and fall. Then curses came to us from without, and a hail of bullets whizzed past our ears. At the same instant we heard oars grating against the rocks.

Then we understood. We had not thought to guard our boat. The watchmen had taken it, and, knowing every inch of the coast, would doubtless run it away.

Another hail of bullets made us dodge. Nikolai came limping back to me, his face convulsed with fury.

"We're trapped like rats," he said between his teeth. Then a thought struck him.

"They must have a boat of their own," he called. "Follow me!" He dashed across the rocks again, the rest of us after him. When we reached the other side we found the remains of a painter. The light-house keepers had taken their own boat as well. And, while we waited there, a sucession of five shots came from the darkness on this side also. We cowered back into the darkness.

"One man in that boat," said Nikolai. "Those shots are from his magazine. And two in the other. Now—are they acting in concert, or does each think we are the other?"

We were soon undeceived. As by a signal, a volley came from either side. Two of our men cried, stumbled, and sliding across the slippery weed, splashed into the sea.

The wind was rising, and all the while the breakers had been pounding upon the rocks. We shouted in vain; we could not make our voices heard above the uproar of the elements. Rain was falling, mingled with a light snow.

"Into the light-house, men," cried Nikolai; and we reached cover just as another volley flattened itself against the massive walls.

We looked around us. In a tiny chamber was a heavy table, bolted into the stone. Nikolai set his shoulder against it and wrenched it bodily from its fastenings. Then we half dragged, half carried it along the narrow passage to the doorway, where we tilted it on end. It fitted the orifice well and formed a barricade against surprise.

But our condition was a desperate one. We had only our cutlasses and revolvers against rifles, and no more than twelve cartridges apiece. Yet we were three against three; and if our adversaries had command of the offensive there was always the yacht.

As the attack was not renewed, we left the third on guard and descended into the bottom story of the light-house. Here we found a curious, winding passageway, cut out of the living rock, apparently, and opening into an extensive chamber, evidently the work of engineers. At the entrance we discovered ample provisions in the shape of flour and salted meat, as well as dried fruits and a great tank of water, connecting with what must have been a rain reservoir on the top of the light-house. As we approached the chamber in the rock a low moan reached my ears.

"There are men in there!" I cried to Nikolai.

"Who are you?" he called.

Only a moan answered. An oil lamp was burning in a niche of the damp wall. Nikolai snatched it up and, despite my warnings, advanced toward the dark recesses of the prison, I following. In the far nook we saw a sight that called forth a cry of pity from my companion.

Stretched out upon a bed of filthy straw, his hands chained to steel staples in the wall, was an old man, emaciated, and apparently upon the verge of death. Beside him knelt a woman, of mature years, but bearing the marks of great beauty and dignity, despite the prison pallor of her face.

"In the name of God, who are you, friend?" asked Nikolai.

"I am Adam Gortchakoff," answered the old man, opening his eyes.

I saw Nikolai start back and clap his hand to his forehead.

"How long have you been confined here, Adam Gortchakoff?" he asked with a quavering voice.

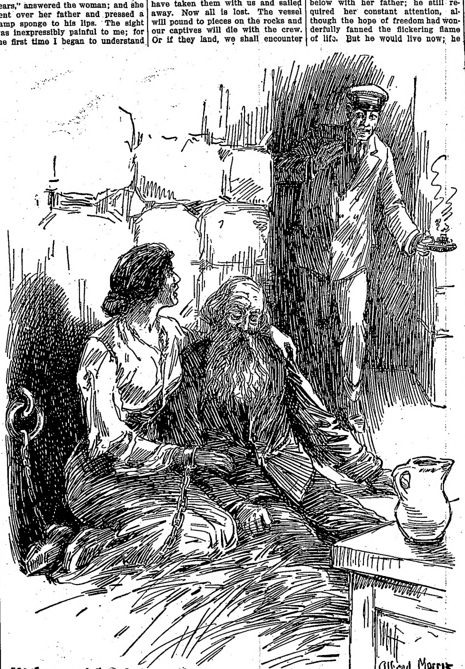
"Twelve years," the old man answered. "And my daughter also."

"God help you," muttered Nikolai. Tears welled into his eyes. "Russia has not forgotten you," he said, raising the old man's hand to his lips. "Nor you, madame. But we thought you had died in Archangel."

"There were twelve prisoners here when I arrived," said the woman in French. "My father and I have alone survived." She turned upon Nikolai fiercely. "Does Nicholas Stambuloff still work for Russia?" she asked.

"He is still our hope and Russia's hope," said Nikolai. Then, hastily, he began telling them of the desperate chance that had let us hither. "Can you endure your chains for a few hours longer?" he asked.

"We have endured them twelve years," answered the woman; and she bent over her father and pressed a damp sponge to his lips. The sight was inexpressibly painful to me; for the first time I began to understand something of the hatred which inspired Nikolai against the tyranny of the tsar.



"In the name of God, who are you?"

But he could linger no longer. Bidding them a hasty farewell, and assuring them of their approaching liberty, Nikolai retreated up the stairs. Outside dawn was breaking. Our man was still on guard; the attack had not been renewed.

"I dared not tell her that her lover is aboard the Potemkin," said Nikolai to me. "Nicholas Stambuloff was captured and sentenced to Archangel; he is one of the six revolutionary leaders—otherwise known as Satcha Alexandrovitch. We must and will restore him and his bride to liberty. And think—for twelve years they have not met."

"On guard!" cried our companion.

We heard steps on the rocks; we drew our revolvers and waited. But, what was our astonishment when, through the mists, we saw our two companions of the yacht and the three Russian soldiers conversing amicably together as they approached us. A short interrogation convinced Nikolai that the truce was a genuine one. We hurried down and, by the aid of a file which the soldiers gave us, had soon freed the prisoners from their bonds. Then, seated together over a meal, explanations were offered and received.

It appeared that the light-house was used as a secret penal station to which prisoners were sent who had been sentenced to the mines of Archangel. The secret had been well kept, and this explained why none of those sent to the frozen north had ever been heard from. They were not there; the cruisers put them invariably upon this desolate rock, where they remained in chains until death claimed them. The soldiers naturally thought that we had discovered the location of their captives; this explained their desperate efforts to regain the light-house. They had abandoned the attempt, knowing of the death of two of our men, and had resolved to make by boat for the open sea.

But they had known nothing of our yacht. The men whom we had left there, seeing the soldiers advancing in their boat through the fog, had believed them to be us; they themselves were not seen by the soldiers, who, in rowing, naturally had their backs toward the open sea. Thus the two parties ran into each other's arms. Cut off from the open sea, the soldiers had nowhere to escape; on the other hand, the men in the yacht, anxious to learn our fate, opened a parley with them, being all Russians and from the same territory. In the end it was recognized that a truce must be effected until the fortune of war should decide for one side or the other. This was satisfactory to the soldiers, but more so to us, who knew of the approach of the Potemkin.

"Fools that we were," said Nikolai to me. "Had we known what we know now we should have let the Potemkin land her new captives here, concealing our yacht in the offing, and, when she had departed, we should have taken them with us and sailed away. Now all is lost. The vessel will pound to pieces on the rocks and our captives will die with the crew. Or if they land, we shall encounter the attack of a hundred desperate men. At all costs the Potemkin must be saved."

"We can save her yet," I answered. "One lens is still unbroken. It was struck from the frame but not shattered. With this we can bring the vessel in safely."

"How?" asked Nikolai.

I took him up into the light chamber. As I had said, one of the three great lenses had remained uninjured. Then I explained my plan. As Nikolai took it in he became greatly excited. He clapped me upon the shoulder and strode up and down the room, vowing that the bride should yet be restored to her husband, from whose arms she had been snatched a short week after the wedding, twelve years before.

This was the scheme. The single lens, set into the central frame, would convey the light straight out to sea and afford a signal for the cruiser. The Potemkin would anchor in the offing, place the prisoners in a boat under a guard, and row them ashore. We should admit them, capture and disarm the guard, and hold them in the vaults. The next party that came would meet a similar fate; and so all who arrived, for even if they suspected any danger, we could defend the light-house against a regiment, while the thick fog would render a bombardment impossible. What would probably occur, however, would be that the ship's officers, after the second party failed to return, would believe that both boats had been swamped in the breakers, and would take the ship back to Russia without further investigation.

We raised the great lens into the central frame. We refilled the oil lamp; and once more, though on either of two sides was darkness, through the central aperture a great searchlight shone straight out to sea.

It was a little after midday when, through the thick mists that enfolded us, we heard the booming of guns.

One, two, three—and silence. Then the signal was repeated.

It was the Potemkin.

We put our three friendly enemies down in the vaults, first exchanging clothes with them. They went readily enough, when we had explained to them that their imprisonment was only temporary, until after the vessel's departure. Then three of us, dressed in the Russian uniform, with the two other men in the rear of us, waited for the arrival of the boat.

It seemed an endless interval—it was really about an hour before the ship's boat grated against the rocks. She carried the six prisoners, chained, with six armed guards. Nikolai welcomed the sailors in their native tongue. They advanced, entirely unsuspecting. Then, in a trice, we had sprung on them and disarmed them. So sudden was our attack that they attempted no resistance; they stood staring at us, foolishly grinning. The prisoners were no whit less astonished.

I did not admit Nicholas Stambuloff to see his bride, as Nikolai wanted. The shock would have been too sudden for both of them. We kept her below with her father; he still required her constant attention, although the hope of freedom had wonderfully fanned the flickering flame of life. But he would live now; he would see freedom if never Russia again.

We placed our new captives with the soldiers below and waited for the second boat. But no boat came. With the callousness of the Russian officer, the commander cared nothing for the fate of the crew. If they had perished on that dangerous coast, at least their captives, chained as they were, had died with them. That was all he cared about. At four o'clock we heard four guns fired in swift succession. It was the sign of departure.

Excusing himself, Nikolai rushed up the stairs. I would have followed him, but he signed to me to wait below. When he returned I could gather no information as to the reason of his departure.

We brought our captives, now nine in number, up from the vaults. The situation had already been explained to the sailors by the three soldiers. We offered them a safe passage to England, our destination, whence they could readily ship aboard some boat for the Baltic. As there was no alternative, our terms were eagerly accepted, and once more our enemies were converted into friends. I congratulated ourselves upon the termination of our adventure—bloodless, save for the death of our two men the night preceding.

But when at last Nicholas Stambuloff understood the situation he turned upon Nikolai like a madman.

At first his anger was incomprehensible to all of us. Nikolai, soothing him as a child, told him that presently he should meet some one whom he would be gald to see.

"There is nobdy whom I would be glad to see," raved Nicholas. "Do you know what you have done, you hound? Listen, and I will tell you.

"Twelve years ago my bride, married a week to me, was snatched from my arms and carried off to a dungeon by the soldiers of Russia's tyrant. I never saw her face from that day to this. After a mockery of a trial she was found guilty of conspiring against the tsar and sentenced to Archangel.

"I could have given myself up and received the same sentence. I could have been banished thither and have joined her there. And I refused. Do you know why I voluntarily cut myself off from sharing her exile? For Russia's sake. For Russia's sake, and because, while free, I could still fight for liberty, I hid from the soldiers, I worked in Russia for the cause. Every day I have hoped for capture; and every day I have worked like a mole in the dark to avoid it—for Russia's sake.

"And when at last the tsar laid hold of me and I was sentenced to Archangel, all my heart leaped up. I knew she was not dead. Had she died I should have felt and known it. I always knew that somewhere my wife lived, waiting for the day of reunion. And all through the voyage on the Potemkin, I was happier than I have ever been before, because I was going to her and should see her again!

"And you, you fool, have ruined this! You have given me back my accused liberty, and once again I must return to Russia to fight for freedom."

Nikolai had signaled to me in the midst of this tirade and I had understood. I went into the vault and led the woman up the stairs. I think she saw him first. Her face grew even paler than the prison pallor had bleached it. Then a flush spread over her cheek and throat. I caught Nicholas by the arm and spun him around. At first he gazed at her with incredulous eyes; then he drew toward her, wonderingly. She held out her arms. I turned and left them.

On the next day we pulled out to the yacht and put our crew aboard. There was nothing but joy among us all at the prospect of departure from those gloomy shores, for already winter was at hand and ice floes choked the sea. There was no time to be lost. We set off southward down the Norwegian coast toward a land of sunshine. I never saw a happier couple than Nicholas and his bride. Only one thing siddened me: bith announced their determination to return to Russia to take up the people's battle.

"It is right," said Nikolai. "That is their only happiness in life. And some day through their efforts and those of their comrades, the land will find its peace again."

Upon the rocky shores lay the wreck of a mighty ship—an armored vessel. Trough the glasses I could make out the name Potemkin on the stern.

She lay half submerged among the lapping waves. There was no signal, no sign of life on board. Had a man survived that sudden wreck he must have perished in the boisterous surf. Nikolai, standing by my shoulder, smiled grimly.

"Look at the light-house," he answered, to my unspoken question.

And then, looking backward, I saw no light.

"Yes," said Nikolai, "that is my work," And then he told me what he had done in the tower on the preceding day.

With his blood-thirst unsatisfied, he had crept up and shifted the great lens from the middle to the side compartment. The light, cut off from the open sea, now flared at an angle of ninety degrees, invisible from where we were, but clearly discernible round the arm of the coast. The captain of the Potemkin, ignorant that the direction of the light beam had been changed, had steered his course by it straight upon the rocks and perished there, with all his crew.

ENGLAND'S MANY RICH MEN

Incomes Largely Derived From Investments Abroad, Which Reach an Enormous Total.

England's assessed income from abroad, as set forth in the income tax statistics last year, reached the immense total of $520,000,000, which represents capital of nearly $13,000,000. These incomes are derived from foreign mines, gas works, water works, tramways, breweries, tea and coffee plantations, nitrate grounds, oil fields, land, financial, telegraph, cable, shipping and insurance companies, branches of banks and mercantile companies, mortgages on property, loans and deposits abroad and profits of all kinds arising from business done abroad by manufacturers, merchants and commission agents. When it is realized how great is the capital invested by Englishmen abroad in these varied interprises the immense aggregate income, outside that included in the income tax statistics, can be imagined.

According to the same statistics, there are 214 persons in the United Kingdom with an income of $275,000, which means that there are that many persons possessing a capital of about $6,000,000 each. But these are not the richest Englishmen. There are 66 with an income of $500,000 and over, 55 with an income of from $375,000 to $500,000, 37 with incomes of $325,000 to $375,000, and 56 with incomes of from $275,000 to $325,000. Furthermore, there are 4,143 persons with incomes of $50,000 and over, which means the possession of a capital of $1,000,000 and more. Consequently the total of persons in the country who possess at least $1,000,000 does not fall short of 4,751.

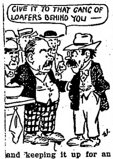
He Did Not Care for Dessert After Free Lunch



GIVE IT TO THAT GANG OF LOAFERS BEHIND YOU —

WASHINGTON.—In the days when the free lunch in this city was in its prime, when tavernkeepers prided themselves on having an array of thirst-provoking delicacies which rivaled the menus of the finest hotels, a government clerk who had an eye on the very first nickel he ever earned used to subsist almost entirely on the provender provided by a certain free lunch counter. Said clerk would prong about a dollar's worth of cheese and wienerwurst, salad, brown bread and all the other stuff that goes to make up the food attractions at tavern bars. He would do this twice a day, once at noon and again at night, and therefore, having spent two nickels for the very good beer offered by the proprietor, he could very well figure that he had lived sumptuously that day for almost nothing.

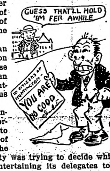
He did this for several months. Finally the long-suffering proprietor recognized the fact that the government clerk was about the only man in the place who was getting something for nothing and keeping it up for an indefinite period

"My friend," he said, while the crowd waited to see him display his coup de grace, as we would say in France, "I have noticed that you take the record as long-distance free lunch borrower? Therefore I would suggest that you wait. You have overlooked something today. If you will stay here a moment the chef will present you with a fine strawberry shortcake."

The proprietor had the sarcasm heavily veiled, but it did not fool that shrewd free lunch operator, who replied:

"Give it to that gang of loafers behind you. I never eat dessert."

Congressman Avis' Short but Effective Speech



GUESS THAT'LL HOLD 'EM FER AWHILE
TO CITIZENS OF HUNTINGTON - YOU ARE NO GOOD

RESIDENTS of Huntington and Charleston, W. Va., are, and always have been, jealous of one another. It is fighting jealousy, too, and not the kind that exists between Toledo and Columbus, in Ohio; St. Louis and Kansas City, in Missouri, which runs mainly to building taller buildings and that sort of thing. The brand of jealousy in West Virginia causes the residents of one town to vow that no good can come out of the other.

They do say that the second most popular man in Charleston is the one who spent his vacation this year kicking the rails of the railroad because they run into Huntington. The most popular man is the one who directed to the "Citizens of Huntington" this telegram: "You are no good." Thus did he insult the whole city at one stroke.

The two cities are constantly fighting over conventions and other big gatherings. All any organization need do to create a deep desire to entertain it is to tip off the leading citizens of one of the two cities that the other wants the organization's convention. Once a political party was trying to decide which of the two cities should have the honor of entertaining its delegates to a state convention. Charleston and Huntington sent representatives to plead their causes.

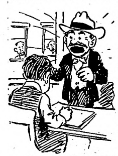
The Huntington man spoke first. He told of the great wealth his city possessed, of its charming people, its fine railroad and hotel accommodations, and, finally, wound up his flight of oratory thus:

"Gentlemen, no city in the United States is laid out as well as Huntington!"

Then up rose Capt. S. B. Avis, now representative from the Third district of West Virginia, to speak for Charleston.

"When Charleston is as dead as Huntington," he said, "it too, will be well laid out."

Put Surrounding Atmosphere to a Great Test



HARRY "OREGON" BROWN, who represents about all the newspapers there are in the northwest cowboy district, was sitting in his office one night last week, when Col. What's His Name dropped in. The colonel, loud of voice and manner, had something to tell Mr. Brown which would be of interest to the readers of one of the Idaho papers which Mr. Brown represents here in Washington.

When he started to talk the walls bulged outward a bit, then gripped themselves and sat tight. Never had the surrounding atmosphere been put to so great a test. The vibrations of the colonel's voice were equal to the splash of a mountain dropping into a placid sea. Doors began to close all over the building, for the men in the various offices wanted to work.

Across the hall from Mr. Brown is "Liz" Jones. He got up and slammed his door with a great show of anger when the colonel started to shout. After it was all over "Liz" went into Mr. Brown's office:

"Say, was that man telling you a news story?"

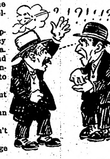
"Yes," confessed Mr. Brown, as he unwrapped the cotton from his ears.

"For what?"

"For my Idaho paper."

"Well, if the editor had his ears open he could save telegraph tolls, for he certainly could have heard it out there."

Representative Kinkead Set the Ball Rolling



REPRESENTATIVE EUGENE KINKEAD of New Jersey bids fair to be the leading practical joker of the Sixty-third congress. When not engaged in trying to find some new method of throttling the beef trust, which is his special nightmare, Kinkead is thinking up some new method of getting a "rise" out of his colleagues.

He nearly caused a serious split between Representative Carter Glass, author of the currency bill, and Representative Bartlett of Georgia. Glass was sensitive about his currency bill, and Bartlett is a self-appointed defender of the constitution. One day Gene Kinkead whispered to Glass:

"What's this that Judge Bartlett is saying about you?"

"Haven't heard," replied the succinct chairman of the banking and currency committee.

"Why, he's telling the fellows that you don't know anything about currency."

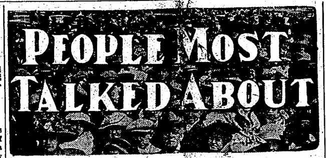
Then he left Mr. Glass and whispered to Judge Bartlett:

"Say, Charlie, are you on the outs with Carter Glass?"

"No, indeed," said Bartlett in surprise. "Why?"

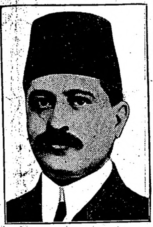
"Well, I just wondered. He's going around saying that you know absolutely nothing about constitutional law."

It took three days to straighten out the matter and, meanwhile, Kinkead had denied flatly saying anything to either congressman. However, it was the twinkle in the Kinkead eye which finally brought the war to a close.



PEOPLE MOST TALKED ABOUT

BURDEN OF BEING A HERO

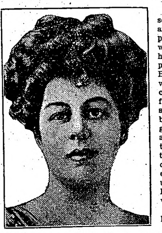


Raouf Hussein Bey, captain of the glorious "Hamidie," is advertising for some one who will take off his shoulders the burden of being a hero. A year's experience has proved that being a hero is tiresome. Raouf can tolerate his popularity, the display of his photographs, the flicker of his moving picture face and his prospects of becoming admiral and marine minister. But against this stands the fact that when you become a hero in Turkey influential people insist on marrying you to a princess. Raouf resents this. Though a Turk, he is more European than Europe itself, and he much prefers the European system under which pretty girls who want to marry heroes send along their photographs. In Turkey they do not get their photographs taken. The sultan merely commands the hero to marry a princess of the ancient, mighty and terrible House of Othman, without even knowing what she's like.

Captain Raouf Hussein is a dark-eyed, thick-nosed, handsome, well-set-up Turk forty years old. He served in the British navy, speaks perfect English, has tasted whisky and soda, and in every other respect is a civilized man. It was Raouf who went to Germany to buy the battleships Weissenburg and Kurfurst Friedrich Wilhelm, which, renamed Messudie and Barbarossa Hairedden, did Turkey such signal service in the war. Raouf is brave. He chafed fiercely against the marine minister for not letting him go out and fight the Greek midgets, and when he did get out he did some damage and spread as much panic as did Cervera while his whereabout were unknown. So Raouf became a hero, and a hero he remains.

But heroes must have imperial wives. Just as Enver Bey was rewarded for his heroism with a princess of the House of Othman (whom, despite reports, he has not yet got), so Raouf must be rewarded. That is the House of Othman system. The princess cannot intermarry with Christian dynasties, and as there are no Moslem dynasties worth mentioning, they must marry at home.

LAMARS MOVE TO CAPITAL

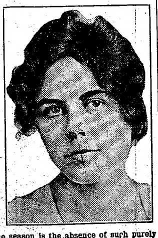


Lamar is a familiar name in the social annals of the national capital, and, glancing through its written pages, it seems a rare occurrence when a representative of the family has not figured. Certainly not for the past 20 or 30 years. Judge William Bailey Lamar and his attractive young wife are welcome additions to the circle composed of former officials for whom the lure of the city is irresistible. They were here for six years, beginning with the Fifty-eighth congress, when the judge, then serving as attorney general of his state, was sent to the lower house. After serving in the Sixtieth congress, Judge Lamar became affiliated with large legal interests in Atlanta, Ga., and resided there until two years ago, when he and Mrs. Lamar returned to Washington, which will hereafter be their winter home.

"Fads are something I never had leisure to cultivate," said Mrs. Lamar.

"One of my delights relates to all that pertains to a home. We recently erected near Atlanta, Ga., a home the thought of which will always give my heart a pang, for it seems now that it will never be our joy to live there. There are 135 acres, many of them in that wonderful woodland for which Georgia is so famous, great sturdy oaks, tall, vigorous pines with great clumps of wild azaleas making natural banks. In the spring this woods is a vision of pink and white loveliness impossible to describe. This home we call Villa Lamar, and it is designed from the celebrated Villa Medici in the Pincian Gardens in Rome, the present home of the American Society of Fine Arts. During the progress of building this home Judge Lamar and I collected books on exterior and interior decorations, on rugs, potteries, mural paintings and decorations and kindred subjects relating to home building. We got together quite an impressive looking library, and in looking them over we both established a love for architecture and applied and textile arts which will endure throughout our lives. Then we took to the outside, and such an array of garden books as we have! All this is a real delight, to which nothing else compares."

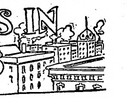
GENEVIEVE CLARK, CAPITAL DEBUTANTE



Quite in keeping with the quaint flounces and furbelows, the "garden slippers," the girlish bonnets and the nosegays of simple blossoms which it is the fashion of the moment for the debutante in the national capital to carry are the old-fashioned hours which they are keeping this season. Speaker Clark's daughter, Genevieve, was among the most prominent of this season's "buds."

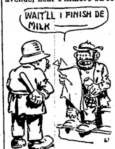
When once an invitation to a debutante's dance bore the legend "ten" or "half-past ten o'clock," today the cards read "nine o'clock," which means that supper will be served at midnight and that by two o'clock the debutante's first dance will be a happy memory.

The reform has come without any effort. Something more subtle than preaching early hours is at work in changing a mode which in the last ten years had become a custom so rigidly observed that no one person or set of persons, however influential, could uproot it. Another feature of the season is the absence of such purely feminine functions as the erstwhile popular debutante luncheon.



HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Funny Newspaper Article Traps Hungry Vagrant



WAIT'LL I FINISH DE MILK

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Dawn was breaking and the streets were very still as Policeman McCarte proceeded along his beat on Golden Gate avenue, near Fillmore street. At midnight, five hours before, when Policeman McCarte, having just reported for duty stood in line with his fellow patrolmen in the assembly room of the Bush street police station, the lieutenant instructed the watch to be particularly on the look out for milk and paper thieves.

Policeman McCarte suddenly remembered the warning of his superior officer as he was gazing at the reddening sky over Oakland and he heard a hearty peal of laughter issuing from some point halfway down the block.

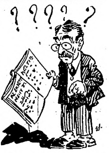
Hearty laughter at dawn when the laughter is not of a maudlin character is an extraordinary phenomenon. This laughter had the tone of sobriety, of appreciation and seemed to proceed from a mirth that bubbled up like a mountain spring in the winter season.

McCarte pulled himself together quickly and hastened down the block on tiptoe to investigate.

In the middle of the square he found a remarkably dirty, bewhiskered tatterdemalion seated coolly on the front steps of a residence reading the morning paper which he had picked up from the doorstep and chuckling continually as he read. The vagrant made quite a picture. In his right hand he held a bottle of milk which he had half emptied and which from time to time he would place to his lips and take a luxurious sip of the beverage.

Five hours later the newspaper was Exhibit No. 1 in the case before Police Judge Sullivan, wherein the vagrant was charged with petty larceny.

Gift From Budapest Puzzles St. Louis Officials



ST. LOUIS, MO.—Some kind friend has sent the secretary of the city council copies of the Budapest Szekes fovaros-Kozigazgatasi Evkoyve and the Adatok Ajarwanyos Belegsegek Es Az Ovintezkedeseki Kerdesbez-Kulonos Tekenteitel A voshenyre. Secretary David W. Voyles is vehemently demanding explanations from somebody. The package looked innocent enough and purported to come from Washington, D. C. The only thing Voyles is right certain about is that the things are books. They open and shut, have covers, and the pages are numbered. Otherwise——

Anyway, the council members refuse to become interested in them. No one has discovered a single line that looks as if it might refer to the free bridge or the billboard ordinance. So far as can be told, there is no reference to the high price of butter and eggs.

Every man who has tried to pronounce a word in the volumes has sprained his tongue. Opinions are divided as to just what the language is in which they are written. Magyar, Sanscrit, Turkish and plain Bohemian are some of the suggestions, with all indications favoring the latter guess. Whatever the books may contain they were written by a Dr. Thirring Gusztav of Budapest, who did not spare words.

Here is a sample passage:

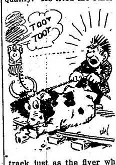
This City Cow Qualifies as a First-Class Militant



PITTSBURGH, PA.—Special Policeman James Boyd of East Pittsburgh doesn't want a job as a cowboy. There's nothing to it! He couldn't qualify. He tried the other day and failed.

Came to the ears of the East Pittsburgh police the story that a stray cow was in the Brinton district and that foreigners were putting a crimp in the dairyman's receipts by milking bossy by turns. Boyd was sent to investigate.

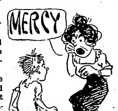
He found the cow—easily. But taking her back one mile to the police station—well, that's another story. Here 'tis:

Boyd hobbled Bossy so that she could not run away—he though. He then tied a rope to her horns and the other end about his waist. They started well, but in crossing the Pennsylvania railroad at Braddock avenue the cow fell in the middle of the track. Boyd heard a passenger train approaching and the cow lay on the track. He was still tied to the cow. By an almost superhuman effort Boyd dragged the animal from the track just as the flyer whizzed by. Once across the track, the cow was relieved of her hobble.

All went well until the Pennsylvania railroad arch bridge was reached. Here the cow refused to move from a spot under the bridge and directly in the middle of the single car track. Traffic was tied for half an hour.

It was after noon when Boyd and his "prisoner" arrived at the police station. The cow is under the special care of Burgess Shields until such time as the owner of the animal appears.

Indiana Girl Awakes to Find Her Tresses Gone



INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—When she was called the other morning, Thelma Long, ten-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Long, 822 East Georgia street, walked into her mother's bedroom, sleepily rubber her eyes.

Her mother held up her hands in horror and demanded:

"Why, Thelma, what have you done with your hair?"

The girl hastily put her hands to her head and found instead of the long flowing locks, the pride of the entire household, only short, stubby bristles. She ran to a mirror and burst into tears.

Mrs. Long, believing the disappearance of the hair was due to a childish prank, cajoled and threatened, but Thelma declared that she did not know what had become of the pretty golden-brown tresses, which were 15 inches long and which she had worn when she retired.

A hasty investigation was made and a door leading to the girl's bedroom was found open.

"Burglars!" exclaimed Mrs. Long.

But nothing except the child's hair was missing from the home.

Mr. Long called police headquarters, and Detectives Simon and Dugan were sent to investigate. They admitted later that the case had them "stumped." The detectives have something of a reputation as "confessors," but they could not get Miss Long to admit that she knew what had become of her treasured locks.

"I loved them too much," she declared when it was suggested that she had cut them off herself.

ANTI-TRUST BILLS MERELY TENTATIVE

MEASURES ARE LIKELY TO BE CHANGED IN MANY WAYS.

HEARINGS TO FIX FINAL FORM

Three Bills Not to Be Introduced Till Publicly Discussed—Leaders Determined to Exhaust Subject.

Washington, Jan. 26.—The anti-trust legislative program as outlined in bills made public is not the last word in proposed remedial legislation to regulate big business. That the tentative measures submitted may be altered or extended was emphasized in both branches of congress and the president let it be known that he did not consider the forms of the bills drafted closed.

Bill Not Introduced.

Pursuant to the purpose of administration leaders to exhaust the subject it was determined by the house judiciary and senate interstate commerce committees not to introduce at this time the measures relating to interlocking directorate prohibition, definitions of restraints of trade and specification of "cut throat" competition.

Hearings on these questions are to be held before the bills go to congress.

The interstate trade commission bill introduced Friday will be taken up immediately by the house interstate and foreign commerce committee, which may see fit to alter the provisions suggested by the judiciary subcommittee and Senator Newlands, chairman of the senate interstate commerce committee.

Fifth Bill to Wait.

The fifth of the proposed bills, that to authorize federal regulation of railroad securities, probably will not be drawn for several weeks. As a basis for this measure however, a bill introduced some time ago by Representative Adamson of Georgia probably will be taken.

Plans for the hearings now are engaging attention of the legislative leaders. When the Democrats of the senate interstate commerce committee met to discuss the subject the suggestion was made that hearings should be conducted jointly by house and senate committees in order to expedite consideration of the bills. This idea received very little encouragement, however, from the house leaders in charge of the anti-trust program and the plan hardly will work out, unless strong pressure should be brought to bear on the ground that everything possible should be done to expedite the business of congress so there may be an early adjournment.

Joint Hearings Difficult.

With two committees in the house already engaged in preliminary consideration of the subject and with the prospect of another division of jurisdiction in the senate between the judiciary and interstate commerce committees it was pointed out that joint hearings could not be conducted without considerable difficulty. Democrats of the senate interstate commerce commission were inclined to insist that all the trust measures be referred to them when the bills are introduced in the upper branch.

Members of both committees after discussing at some length the question of making the bills party measures through caucus action expressed the hope that it would not be necessary to handle them in this way, as was done with the tariff and currency bills.

Will Call Senator O'Gorman.

New York, Jan. 26.—United States Senator James O'Gorman will be a witness at District Attorney Charles J. Whitman's John Doe investigation into state highway and canal graft, Mr. Whitman announces. Senator O'Gorman was quoted by William Sulzer as having told him that James E. Gaffney, business and political associate of Charles F. Murphy, had attempted to exact a $100,000 political contribution from James C. Stewart, a state highway contractor, the senator's client.

Debate Alaska Railway Bill.

Washington, Jan. 26.—With several amendments still pending, the senate has not reached a final vote on the Alaskan railway bill. Debate and voting on proposed amendments to the Alaska bill continued through the day, but Senator Chamberlain announced he would insist upon a final vote before adjournment. Under an agreement the "legislative day of Jan. 22," will not end in the senate until the measure is passed upon.

Hungarian Parliament in Riot.

Buda Pest, Austro-Hungary, Jan. 26. —Armed guards had to be called into the lower house of the Hungarian parliament to eject unruly members of the opposition during a debate on the press reform law. Ex-Premier Count Julius Andrassy, Count Aladar Zichy and a dozen other deputies were thrown out of the building after defying a ruling by the president. The uproar was so great that it was impossible to conduct business until the excitement subsided.

LARGEST BANK ACCEPTS PLAN

NATIONAL CITY OF NEW YORK ADOPTS CURRENCY SYSTEM.

No Official Statement Is Likely Until President Vanderlip's Return From Paris.

New York, Jan. 26.—It has become known in financial circles that the National City bank of New York city, the largest institution of its kind in the United States, will accept the federal reserve system, despite rumors to the contrary.

Officers of the bank gave out the information that the National City would in all probability enter the federal system created under the new currency law.

There had been rumors afloat that the National City intended to surrender its government charter, cease business as a national bank, and merge with the Corn Exchange bank, the largest state institution. Such a financial institution would mean a state bank, the combined resources of which would probably overshadow any regional reserve bank which might be established here.

It is probable no official statement will be made until the return of Frank A. Vanderlip, president of the City bank, who is now in Paris, conferring with James Stillman, the chairman of the board of directors.

Financiers not affiliated with the National City bank expressed surprise when informed of its intention, chiefly because of the opposition to the currency bill maintained by some of its leading officers. Moreover, the misunderstandings said to exist between the bank and the treasury department at Washington gave rise to the belief in some quarters that the bank was seriously considering the organization of an institution which would enable it to become a formidable competitor with the reserve system.

The differences between the bank and the treasury department began with the expulsion from the department of a woman employe of the bank who for years gathered statistical information for the bank.

Some of the largest national banks of this city have already applied for membership in the new system, including the Chase National, the Park National, the Fourth National and the National Bank of Commerce. This leaves few banks of the first rank yet to be heard from.

STRIKE SYMPATHIZERS RIOT

Trouble in Trinidad Street When Militia Breaks Up Parade of Women and Children.

Trinidad, Col., Jan. 24.—Twenty or more persons, including eight women, are under arrest and at least five are known to be suffering from slight injuries as the result of a serious street riot, which took place here, when the militia, under the personal direction of General John Chase, broke up a crowd of strike sympathizers which was attempting to march to San Rafaeil hospital where "Mother" Jones is held under military arrest.

Stones, bottles and bricks were hurled at the militiamen by a crowd of angry women who precipitated the outbreak when they were ordered to turn back by the soldiers.

Several soldiers, including Major H. M. Randolph, were assaulted, and not until the cavalrymen with drawn swords had charged the crowd several times was it dispersed.

One soldier sustained a broken rib when his horse fell and one of the rioters received a cut from a sabre.

The riot followed the parade of the wives and children of the striking coal miners which had been planned by the union leaders.

AN OFFICIAL MARRIAGE COURT

Suggested Municipal Judges Set Aside One Day Each Per Month for Weddings.

Chicago, Jan. 26.—An official marriage court is recommended by County Clerk Sweitzer in a letter to Chief Justice Olson of the municipal court. His suggestion is in harmony with a campaign to prevent "child" marriages, which has resulted in the stationing of an officer of the school board at the window of the license clerk and the driving of agents of justices of the peace from the courthouse.

There are about 30 judges in the municipal court and Mr. Sweitzer suggested each judge be appointed to spend one day a month marrying all who apply to him.

The suggestion will be considered at the next meeting of the judges.

Higgins Held to Grand Jury.

Aledo, Ill., Jan. 26.—Robert Higgins, who was arrested Monday charged with having murdered his wife in order to marry his 15-year-old stepdaughter, waived preliminary examination and was held to the grand jury.

Claims to Be Baron's Son.

Boston, Jan. 26.—Asserting that he is the son of Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal, late high commissioner for Canada, James H. Smith of Brookline will take steps, it is said, to obtain recognition of his interests in the vast estate. Mr. Smith refused to talk about it, but his wife said counsel has been engaged to represent him in presenting his claim to the executors of Lord Strathcona. Mrs. Smith added that no court action would be instituted unless friendly overtures were without avail.

LOOKING DOWN INTO SAKURA-JIMA VOLCANO

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

Later reports of the eruption of the Sakura-Jima volcano in Japan do not lessen the horrors of that disaster, in which thousands of lives were lost. The volcanic disturbances there have not ceased, though decreasing in violence.

TORREON WILL BE SCENE OF BATTLE

REBELS AND FEDERALS CONCENTRATE FORCES FOR VERY IMPORTANT FIGHT.

AN ATTEMPT TO STOP VILLA

Huerta Troops Will Try to Resist Further Advances of Constitutionalists Towards Mexico City.

Chihuahua, Mexico, Jan. 24.—Rebels and federals are concentrating their forces for a decisive battle at Torreon —a battle that is expected to decide whether or not General Villa can push on to the central and southern states with his victorious army from the north.

More Troops Sent.

Villa has sent several more troop trains south. He thus far has succeeded in advancing the bulk of his army to Jiminez, half way to Torreon, without resistance.

There is every indication that the Huerta government is preparing to make a desperate resistance at Torreon, risking everything in a supreme effort to prevent Villa's 15,000 victorious rebels advancing further in the direction of Mexico City.

"GHOST" FOR THIRD DEGREE

Slain Wife Returns to Demand Why Husband Did Deed—Fails to Work.

Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 26.—The "third degree" with a "ghost" as the central figure was applied by arresting officers in an attempt to obtain from John H. Grondin, a young druggist, a confession to the slaying of his wife, Zella, according to a statement made public by his attorney.

Grondin's counsel declared that shortly after he was arrested Saturday night he was taken by detectives into a darkened room where a "ghost" soon appeared and demanded in gloomy tones, "Why did you murder me?"

His attorneys said the question and the "ghost" failed to shake their client's protestations of innocence.

St. Louis Dooms Segregated District.

St. Louis, Jan. 26.—The entire segregated vice district of St. Louis will be closed for all time on March 1, 1914, by an order of the board of police commissioners just issued. The order is the result of a crusade waged here by the committee of 100 for the suppression of commercialized vice. It means the elimination from St. Louis of about 70 resorts and about 500 inmates.

Lane Accepts Judge's Resignation.

Washington, Jan. 24.—The resignation of Judge James W. Witten, chief law officer of the general land office since the position was created, more than twenty years ago, has been accepted by Secretary Lane. Judge Witten, a native of Missouri, is well known throughout the west, where hundreds of thousands of people have been before him at land drawings and registrations. He will practice law here. Secretary Lane praised Judge Witten's service.

U. S. MAY BUILD RADIUM PLANT

GOVERNMENT WOULD USE COLORADO DEPOSITS

Tentative Scheme for Great Federal Producing Concern is Discussed in Washington.

Washington, Jan. 26.—Tentative plans for the construction of a great government radium producing plant in Colorado were discussed at a conference in the interior department between Secretary Lane and all the members of the Colorado delegation in congress.

It was agreed that there should be no announcement concerning the scheme until the details have been worked out, but it is understood the Colorado senators and representatives told Secretary Lane that they would not continue opposition to the pending bills for withdrawal of radium-bearing lands from entry if they could be assured that the lands would be developed and not allowed to stand untouched for conservation's sake.

Secretary Lane has been urging the withdrawal of radium lands to prevent them from falling into the hands of a private monopoly.

BUMPER CROP OF ORANGES

Fifteen for Each Person in United States Is This Year's California Crop Alone.

Chicago, Jan. 26.—After three years of disappointments, Pacific coast citrous fruit growers this year have produced a bumper crop, according to a statement issued by E. O. McCormick, vice president of the Southern Pacific railroad.

This year's crop of oranges alone, according to Mr. McCormick, will be sufficient to provide every person in the United States with at least 15 oranges each.

Estimates at present place the California shipment at 40,000 cars, more than double that of a year ago, and more than has been sent east any year in the life of the industry.

Copenhagen Church Burned.

New York, Jan. 24.—News of the destruction by fire of the social settlement church founded by the Methodist Episcopal church in Copenhagen, reached the Methodist board of foreign missions here in a dispatch from the Danish capital. The church with the parsonage and other attached buildings was valued at $100,000.

Suffragists Lose at Washington.

Washington, Jan. 26.—Woman suffragists met another defeat when the house rules committee by tie vote, four to four, failed to report a resolution for the appointment of a standing suffrage committee.

Cook Kills French Diplomat.

Tangier, Morocco, Jan. 26.—Paul Chevandier de Valdrome, the French diplomatic agent here, was shot and killed by his cook, a man named Sure, in the presence of guests who had been invited to attend an official dinner in the legation. All the guests had assembled but the cook refused to serve the dinner and M. de Valdrome after vainly expostulating with him, ordered him out of the house. The cook followed him and drawing a revolver shot the diplomatic agent twice.

"GO AHEAD" SPIRIT TO RULE YEAR 1914

THOUSANDS LAID OFF IN 1913 HAVE RETURNED TO WORK SINCE JAN. 1.

CHICAGO FINANCIERS' VIEWS

Big Bankers and Business Men All Seem to Be Optimistic—What the Various Ones Say on the Subject.

Chicago, Jan. 27.—Business conditions in Chicago and throughout the country are decidedly better than they were a short time ago. Nineteen hundred and fourteen promises to be a year of profitable activity. The present looks like a good time to "go ahead."

That, in brief, is a summary of the views expressed by a number of prominent bankers, manufacturers, and merchants interviewed.

Men Put on Again.

Since Jan. 1 several thousand men who had been laid off late in 1913 have been put back to work in different industries. Reports are that working forces will be still further increased.

Among the points advanced as indicating an active business year are:

The seeming certainty that the railroads will be granted an advance of 5 per cent in freight rates.

More plentiful supply of money and lower interest rates.

Coming inauguration of the new system of regional reserve banks, which is counted on "to make panics impossible."

Better understanding between business men and the administration.

J. Ogden Armour, who conducts one of the greatest business enterprises in the world, expressed his satisfaction with the present outlook.

"The business outlook is rosy, indeed," said Mr. Armour. "The manufacturers will be busy and money will be easy."

The "Go Ahead" Spirit.

Bankers in Chicago repeat the optimistic "go ahead" assertions made in the city by Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo. "Those are my sentiments," said James B. Forgan, president of the First National bank, and added that the "go ahead" spirit, coupled with a general feeling of optimism, presaged a better business condition.

"Money rates are softer than they have been in months. Rates are settling around a 5 per cent basis in Chicago. Money is flowing in from the country in large volumes, but it is a natural situation at this time. Our customers report that business is picking up and the collections are fairly good."

John J. Mitchell, president of the Illinois Trust & Savings bank, said:

"Business sentiment has improved greatly in the last week or ten days, although the tangible developments which should show as a result of this condition, have not as yet become numerous. I believe that if the railroad rate advances are allowed, and I am of the opinion they will be, the incident will have a splendid influence based upon the better feeling which already has been established."

Patten Hopes for Prosperity.

James A. Patten, declaring that he hoped for prosperity during the coming year, said that the results accomplished so far had been small.

E. D. Hulbert, vice president of the Merchants' Loan & Trust company, pointed out that the fact that manufacturers were inclined to increase the working forces in their plants was one of the best indications of better conditions.

"Write 'optimism' in blackface type clear across the page and you will express my sentiments," said Harry N. Wheeler, vice president of the Union Trust company.

$5 FOR SIX YEARS' LABOR

No Haircuts Nor Shaves Except at Sheep Shearing Time—Held by Michigan Farmer.

Mason, Mich., Jan. 27.—A story of a six years' toil with a stable for his bedroom and $5 his salary for the entire period is related by Arthur Pomeroy, who has returned to his father, a Gladwin county farmer. Pomeroy said that for six years the only time he had a haircut and shave was at sheep shearing time, once a year.

Six years ago Pomeroy left his father's farm to visit their former home in Ohio. Pomeroy said he had gone to work for an Ingham county farmer, who had paid him only $5 and had held him there.

When Pomeroy fled from the farm his whiskers were two feet long and his hair fell like a mane around his shoulders.

Would Cut School Vacation.

Washington, Jan. 27.—Characterizing the practice of closing the public schools during the summer months as "primitive and preposterous," and declaring that the most important problem of today was to "keep the city boys from three months' contamination in the streets," P. P. Claxton, commissioner of the United States bureau of education, approved a plan which would mean continuous school sessions and through which 2,000,000 children might be enlisted in vocational work.

HIS FIRST YEAR AT FARMING IN SASKATCHEWAN

Win Premiums and Prizes in Competition With the World.

There are thousands of young men filling positions in stores and offices, and in professional occupations throughout the United States, who in their earlier life, worked on the farm. The allurements of city life were attractive, until they faced the stern reality. These people would have done better had they remained on the farm. Many of them, convinced of this, are now getting "back to the land," and in the experience, no better place offers nor better opportunity afforded, than that existing in Western Canada. Many of them have taken advantage of it, and there are to be found today, hundreds of such, farming in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The conditions that surround farming operations today are so much superior to those in existence during their early farming days, that there is an attraction about it. Improved machinery, level and open plains, no rocks to shun, no trees to cut down, but wide stretches with mile-long furrows, elevators to handle the grain, railways to carry it to market, and bring almost to their doors the things necessary to operate. Splendid grazing areas, excellent opportunities for raising cattle. These things are all so different from what they once were that there is reason to speak of the attractions. R. H. Crossman of Kindersley, Saskatchewan, the man who won such splendid prizes at the International Dry Farming Congress held at Tulsa, Oklahoma, last fall, grew the prize grains during his first year farming. Up to 1913 he was an engineer and the only knowledge he had of farming was that obtained when he was a boy. That was very useful; in fact it was valuable to him. He had not forgotten it. Thousands with as little experience as he had can do well by taking up one of the 160-acre grants offered by the Canadian government. — Advertisement.

Laugh Away the Clouds.

Mistakes are to be laughed at. If one were to take seriously every little mistake he made life would become a burden to him. Laugh at your own little mistakes, and do not feel grieved if others laugh at them. Laughing will help you remember to avoid them another time quite as well as giving away to serious regrets. Some people are forever taking themselves to task for some shortcoming. They are the over-conscientious ones. If we act foolishly on the impulse of a moment, it is no more fair to punish ourselves than to punish a child for a little mistake. It is right to look for the error and acknowledge it. If one has wronged another, he ought to confess it and be more careful; then put it out of mind. To grow morose and solemn is to commit a second fault. No one is doing any good to himself or others by constantly eating the bread of penitence. The only time to remember a mistake is when one is tempted again to the same fault. Daily and hourly keeping up self-reproach, one is worn out. This does not mean never to listen to the warnings of conscience, but to see the fault, start afresh and keep cheerful and hopeful.

Noble Young Man.

"I trust, sir, that you have not been indiscreet enough to speak to my daughter about marriage?" said the stern parent to the youth who had just asked for his daughter's hand.

"I have not, sir," replied the youth; "but I was strongly tempted to do so last evening when she kissed me good night on the steps."

The average man's brains are useful to another man who knows just how to use them.

FRIENDLY TIP.
Restored Hope and Confidence.

After several years of indigestion and its attendant evil influence on the mind, it is not very surprising that one finally loses faith in things generally.

A N. Y. woman writes an interesting letter. She says:

"Three years ago I suffered from an attack of peritonitis which left me in a most miserable condition. For over two years I suffered from nervousness, weak heart, shortness of breath, could not sleep, etc.

"My appetite was ravenous but I felt starved all the time. I had plenty of food but it did not nourish me because of intestinal indigestion. Medical treatment did not seem to help. I got discouraged, stopped medicine and did not care much whether I lived or died.

"One day a friend asked me why I didn't try Grape-Nuts food, stop drinking coffee and use Postum. I had lost faith in everything, but to please my friend I began to use both and soon became very fond of them.

"It wasn't long before I got some strength, felt a decided change in my system, hope sprang up in my heart and slowly but surely I got better. I could sleep very well; the constant craving for food ceased and I have better health now than before the attack of peritonitis.

"My husband and I are still using Grape-Nuts and Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The MARSHAL

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, in the home of the lad's parents in the village of Vicques, France, where the emperor had briefly stopped to hold a council of war. Napoleon prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois meets a stranger who is astonished when the boy tells him of his ambition. Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The general offers Francois a home at the Chateau. The boy refuse to leave his parents, but in the end becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis's son while the former goes to America. The Marquis before leaving for America asks Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro.

CHAPTER XII.

The Mother of a Prince.

The walls of the palace at Ancona dropped to the sea; against them the waves danced. Out on the blue water lay a fleet of fishing-boats, and the wind flapped torn sails, and the sunlight glanced on battered hulls and littered decks. The woman who sat by an open window of the palace pushed the black trailing of her gown from her, as if the somberness hurt her eyes; she laid her head against the window-frame and stared at the breeze-tossed waves and the fishing fleet.

"It may be our only hope of escape—those wretched boats," she said, half aloud, and her blue eyes were full of sadness, almost of hopelessness.

A sound caught her ear, and she lifted her head quickly. The door into the next room was partly open and some one moved there, that was all. She turned, the lines of her figure falling again into a melancholy pose.

"The doctor takes a long time," she spoke, and gazed out once more to the water.

There had been a spirited young girl years before who had romped in the gardens of Malmaison, who had led the laughter which echoed through those avenues of lime and plantain, whose sweetness and vivacity had drawn the figure of Napoleon himself into the vortex of gladness which was her atmosphere. Always brightness seemed to follow her through the enchantment of the place; always she seemed to move in gaiety. Today, on a March morning of 1830, this was she—Hortense.

The daughter of France she had been, the queen of Holland, and now for years an exile. Here, ill, a fugitive, in her nephew's palace at Ancona, with the Austrians at the gate of the city, she waited in anxiety almost more intense than she could bear the word of the doctor as to her son. Five days before, at Forli, her older boy had died, and her sore heart stirred with a sickening throb as she thought of this other—Louis—now her only child, lying in the room beyond in a high fever, ill with the disease with which his brother had fallen. A woman's soul might well be overcrowded with such sorrow and such fear, but there was more. Her two boys had thrown in their lot shortly before with the Italian revolutionists, and had fought, and had distinguished themselves. And now that the revolution of the Romagna was a failure, that the Austrian army was advancing victoriously, now that death had taken the older to safety, the younger—Louis—the invalid lad in the room beyond, was in imminent danger. He was excepted from the general amnesty; the natural ways of escape were closed, for the authorities of Tuscany and of Switzerland had let her know that the Prince would not be permitted in those territories. From Rome two of her son's uncles, Cardinal Fesch and King Jerome, had sent word that if he were taken by the Austrians he was lost. And at the moment when Hortense had decided to carry her boy off to Turkey by way of Corfu, an Austrian fleet appeared in the Adriatic.

In such a critical state were the affairs of the black-gowned woman who gazed from the palace windows to the sea. The doctor was with her son. The boy's condition seemed to her no better, but worse than the day before; she waited an official verdict. The door opened and she looked up as a tall man came in.

"Doctor," she stammered and stopped—she feared to ask.

"Your majesty," the old man said gravely. "I grieve to be the bearer of bad news."

"He is worse, Doctor?" The words came with a gasp; she felt that she could not face more trouble.

"Yes, your Majesty, the fever has increased since yesterday. With his youth and strength we may hope—if he is carefully nursed—but to move him would be madness."

Queen Hortense struck her hands together. "What can I do? What can I do?" she demanded, and the doctor stood gravely regarding her, helpless, with all his devotion to the house of Bonaparte, to suggest a way out. "If he stays he will be taken—they will execute him. If he goes he will die on the way," she cried in an agony of indecision. "Doctor, tell me, think for me—how can I save him?"

And the doctor still stood silent, suffering with the impotent desire to help her. "If—if only the Austrians might think that the Prince were gone," he stammered, and hated himself for the futility of the words. But the Queen stood with a hand half lifted, arrested. Her blue eyes were alive with the crossing and weaving of swift ideas, and then with a catch of her breath she laughed at him like a pleased child. "Doctor, you are a very clever man," she said. "Together we are going to save the Prince."

The vivacity of the schoolgirl of Madame de Campan flashed for a moment into her manner, warmed to sudden life by the joy of hope. The doctor waited, enchanted, bewildered, to hear his cleverness explained, but Hortense did always the unexpected thing. She shook her finger at him.

"I'm not going to tell you," she said. "At least not till I have to—not till tomorrow at all events. But all today, as you visit your patients you may think that you are saving the Prince from his enemies—and tomorrow you may know how. Goodby, Doctor," and puzzled and pleased, the physician was gone.

"Send Fritz to me," the Queen ordered, and a moment later the young man who was for years the confidential servant of Hortense, who knew more of the history of her middle years, perhaps, than any other, stood before her. "Fritz, when does a packet sail for Corfu?" she demanded.

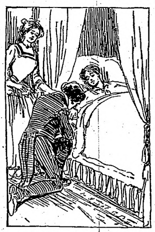
Fritz Rickenbach considered it his business to know everything. "Tonight," your Majesty," he answered unhesitatingly.

"You will see that the luggage of Prince Louis is on board, and that a carriage is ready to take him there," she ordered.

"But yes, your Majesty," Fritz still stood regarding her seriously. "It is a great happiness to me, your Majesty, that his Highness is well enough to travel."

Fritz knew perfectly that there was a complication somewhere, and he wanted to know what it was. His curiosity was patent, but his deep interest in the affairs of his people could not be an impertinence, and the Queen smiled at him.

"You shall know about it, Fritz," she said. "The Austrians are coming. The Prince can not be moved. If they take him, it means death. They must believe that he is gone, and it is for you and me to make them believe it, Fritz. You must get a passport signed by all of the authorities—that is easy today; you must engage his place in the packet for tonight; you must tell the servants—tell every one—that the Prince goes to Corfu, and you must see that the proper luggage is on board. It will be known that I stay, but they will not molest an ill woman. Do you understand the plan, Fritz?"



Francois Was on His Knee by the Bedside.

"But yes, your Majesty," Fritz answered with his face alight.

And so the packet sailed for Corfu, and all day before the sailing the servants of Hortense moved busily between the palace and the boat, carrying luggage and making arrangements. And only one or two knew the secret that Prince Louis Bonaparte had not sailed in the packet but lay tossing with fever in a little room beyond his mother's, carried there for greater privacy by Fritz and the doctor.

Two days later, as the Queen sat quietly by her boy's bedside, she heard that the vanguard of the Austrians had entered the city, and almost at once Fritz came to tell her that the palace in which she was staying had been chosen for the residence of the general commanding. The probability of this had not entered her mind; it seemed the last straw. The Austrian officer demanded the Queen's own chamber for his chief, but when the steward's wife told him the name of the lady who was in the rooms which had not been given up, he bowed deeply and said not a word. It was another of that brotherhood scattered over Europe—the friends of Hortense; it was an officer who had protected her years before at Dijon.

So for a week they lived side by side with their enemies and only a few feet lay between the Prince and capture, for his room was next that of the Austrian general, with but a double door between. It was a life of momentary anxiety, for the Queen feared each time the invalid spoke that they might recognize a man's voice; when he coughed she turned white. But at the end of the week Louis was at last well enough to go. He was to leave Ancona disguised as one of his mother's lackeys, the young Marquis Zappi was to put on another livery, and over the frontier they were both to change and be the sons of Hortense traveling on the Englishman's passport.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Ruse.

The day before the escape, as the Prince, weak and ill yet, lay in bed, word was brought that a messenger of the marquis wished to see the Queen.

"Let me see him too, my mother," the silent, grave young man begged. "It may be that I can help you. I wish to help."

In a moment Fritz introduced a slight alert person whose delicate face was made remarkable by a pair of eyes large and brilliant and full of visionary shadows, yet alive with fire. One saw first those uncommon eyes and then the man. If they had not been entirely concerned with his message they might have remarked that he trembled as he looked at the Prince's face; that his voice shook as he answered the Queen's question.

"I have the unhappiness, your Majesty, to bring you bad news," he said, speaking to her, but still gazing eagerly at the Prince. "The Marquis Zappi, my employer, is ill. He was taken suddenly last night, and today is much worse, and there is no chance that he can travel with your Majesty tomorrow."

The Queen threw out her hands with a gesture of hopelessness. "What can we do?" she exclaimed. "Am I to plan and plan and have always an unconquerable obstacle? Can I not save my boy? I might have known that everything seemed too bright this morning, too good to be true. Yet it is not possible that after all they should"—she looked at her son; her courage came springing back. "They shall not take you," and her eyes flashed defiance at a world of enemies, and she went over and threw her arm about his neck. "Louis, don't let yourself be excited, dearest. They shall not take you. I can save you."

It was as if she put a spur to her brain; there was a moment's silence and the two lads watched her brows drawing together under the concentration of her brain.

"Of course," she said suddenly, and laughed—a spontaneous laughter which seemed to flood her with youthfulness. She turned her blue glance swiftly on the newcomer, the slender boy with the luminous eyes. "You are in the employ of the Marquis Zappi, monsieur?"

"But yes, your majesty. I am the secretary of Monsieur le Marquis." She paused a second, seemed to take stock of the young man, of his looks, his bearing, his accent.

"You are French. Have you a sympathy with the family of my son, with the Bonapartes?"

It was as if a door had been opened into a furnace, so the eyes blazed. "Your majesty, I would give my life for his highness," he said quietly. The impassive face of the young prince turned toward the speaker, and the half-shut heavy glance, which had the Napoleonic gift of holding a picture, rested on him attentively. Louis Bonaparte seemed to remember something.

"What is your name, monsieur?" he asked, and it might have been noticed that his head lifted a little from the pillow as he waited for the answer.

"Francois Beaupre, sire." The young man seemed to be out of breath. "Sire!" Louis Napoleon repeated. And then, "I have seen you before. Where was it? Not in Rome—not in Switzerland—ah!" His hand flew out, and with that Francois was on his knee by the bedside, and had kissed the outstretched thin fingers, and the prince's other hand was on his shoulder fraternally.

"The old chateau of Vicques—my playfellow, Francois. I told you then I was going to remember, didn't I?" Louis Napoleon demanded, laughing boyishly. "Mother, he saved my life from the falling wall. Do you remember the story of my runaway trip?" And Hortense, smiling, delighted to see her sad-faced boy so pleased and exhilarated, did remember, and was gracious and grateful to the young Frenchman. "It is a good omen to have you come to us today," she said with all the dazzling charm which she knew how to throw into a sentence. And then, eager with the headlong zest of a hunter for the game, she caught the thread which wove into the pattern of her scheming. "You would risk something to save him, would you not? You will take the place of the marquis and travel with us, tomorrow, and help me carry away the prince to safety?"

The dark young face was pale. "Your majesty, it is a happiness I had not dared to hope for yet."

"Yet?" the prince demanded laconically. He saved words always, this lad, but he always said his thought.

The other boy's face turned to him, and he answered very simply, "But yes, your highness. I have known always that I should have a part in your highness' fate."

In the gray dawn of the next morning there was a slight stir through the palace, and out between the lines of drowsy Austrian sentinels passed a procession of whose true character they were far from aware, else history had changed. The guard watched the departure; the sick lady—Hortense—late queen of Holland, as they all knew more or less clearly, drove away slowly in her traveling caleche, and on the box was a young man in the livery of a groom whom no one of the half-awake soldiers knew for Prince Louis Napoleon; in the middle of the second carriage sat another youth of two or three years younger who was, the queen's servants had been told, the Marquis Zappi. Their passports were examined and they went through the gates of the city without awakening the least suspicion.

Not once in all their dramatic series of escapes and disguises were Hortense and her sons betrayed, but they had to fear the indiscretion of their friends more than the malignity of their enemies, and this part of Italy was full of friends high and low.

At length it was time for Prince Louis and the sham marquis to drop their liveries and travel as the sons of the English woman for whom their passport was made out. The clothes which Beaupre was to wear had belonged to the young man dead at Forli—Louis Bonaparte's brother—and as he presented himself dressed in them, he saw the painful flush which crept upon the prince's face.

"Your highness, I am sorry," he stammered: "It is grief to me." And then he threw himself impulsively on his knees by the side of Louis' chair. "My prince, I wear them with reverence," he said, and then, hesitating, he added: "Perhaps I would seem less unworthy if your highness knew that, mere secretary as I am, I am yet more. I am noble. It is not simple Francois Beaupre whom you honor, but a man created chevalier by the sword of the emperor."

The dull eyes of the prince shot a glance between drooping lids. "What is it you mean, monsieur?" he demanded. But at the moment the queen entered the room, and the lads sprang to their feet. Her eyes caught the picture of the young Frenchman in his new dress at once; they opened wide and then filled with tears.

"Louis, Louis!" she cried, and laid her hand on his arm. "He looks like him; he looks like Napoleon!"

A deferential knock sounded at the door. Francois sprang to it, and the landlord stood in the opening, bowing elaborately—a soldiery old man with thick grizzled hair.

"A thousand pardons for disturbing miladi and the messieurs," and miladi smiled forgiveness. "Might an old soldier of the emperor dare to say that one could not help knowing the emperor's kinsmen?" He bowed low again to both boys alike, and again Hortense smiled at him. It was comforting to know that the two seemed brothers to the world in general, and she was so used to recognition and loyalty now that they appeared to belong together. "Might an old soldier of the emperor dare to show miladi—her majesty—and the highnesses, the sword which the emperor himself had touched, the sword which he, Jean Gredin, an old cuirassier of the guard, had carried in four battles? There was a little story of the sword, a story also of the wonderful goodness of the emperor, which miladi—her majesty—permitting, he would like to tell to her, as also to the highnesses."

And, her majesty permitting, and the boys pleased and interested, the old cavalryman brought the sword and drew it from its sheath and gave it to each of them to handle, and called on them to remark how it was as keen and bright as it had ever been at Ulm or Austerlitz. He cleared his throat, strongly, for the tale.

"Miladi—her majesty—permitting," he began, "it was on a day two days after the great battle of Austerlitz. The country, as her majesty and the highnesses will remember, was in a most dangerous condition. Desperate bands—" Why was it the landlord stopped?

The party, caught by the fervor of his manner, stared at him, annoyed as the tale of the emperor, promising so well, halted at its beginning. The man stood as if drawn to his tiptoes, every muscle tense, his head turned toward the doorway, listening.

And suddenly they were aware of a stir, a growing noise; there were galloping horses; there was a jingle of harness, and voices coming nearer. With a step backward the landlord flashed a glance from under bushy brows down the corridor, through the open door at the end, which gave on the court of the inn.

"Mon dieu!" He faced the three, standing startled. He spoke fast and low. "Madame, it is a squad of Austrian soldiers; they are upon us. What can we do?" He hesitated only a second. "Bleu-bleu—my horse—saddled under the tree yonder—if one of the princes—if the prince—" He glanced uncertainly from one lad to the other.

But the game was out of his hands. Quicker hands than his had caught the play. Francois Beaupre, the saber of the old cavalryman gleaming in his grasp, sprang to the doorway.

"It is monsieur there who is the prince," he explained rapidly to the landlord. "Hide him, take care of him—I will draw them away. When they are gone, see that the prince and the queen escape. That is for you; you are responsible."

There was the rush of a flying figure down the hallway, and out Francois flashed across a broken line of a dozen dismounted riders, straight toward the landlord's horse held by a groom under the trees. There was a shock of startled silence as the impetuous apparition, saber gleaming at wrist, shot across the court. Then there was a hubbub of voices, and a mass of uniformed figures fell toward him as he threw himself on the horse. A soldier caught at the bridle. The naked sword twinkled and the man was under Bleu-bleu's feet. For a second there was a vortex of men and a frantic horse, and riding the storm a buoyant figure of fury, flashing a blade, with infinite swiftness, this way and that. Then horse and lad shot out from the living canvas, streaked the background of trees a second and were gone, and the Austrian troopers scrambled into their saddles to follow.

Through sun-spotted, breeze-tossed woods tore the chase; across a road and over a low fence, and still Francois led, but the heavy horses gained. It was a hopeless hunt, for the landlord's mount was no match for the big cavalry horses, yet the rider's light weight and clever horsemanship counted, and it was fully four miles from the inn when Bleu-bleu stumbled and fell at a ditch, and Francois pitched over his head. His lead was short by now, and they were on him in a moment, in a mass; he was seized by a dozen burly Austrians.

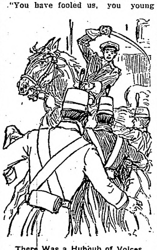
The leader took a sharp look at him as he stood panting, staring defiantly.

"What is this?" the Austrian demanded sternly, and wheeled to a trooper in a bunch. "Friedrich, thou knowest the cub of the Bonapartes. Is this lad he?"

And Friedrich lunged forward, gasping, for he had run his horse hard, and shook his head. "No, my captain. I have never seen this one."

The boy looked from one to another of the threatening group, smiling, composed in spite of his quick breathing. The captain took a step close to him and shook his fist in his face.

"You have fooled us, you young game-cock, have you? But wait. Do you know what we will do to you, you bantam of a Frenchman? Do you know how we will treat you for this, we Austrians?"



There Was a Huboub of Voices.

Color deepened in his cheeks, and Francois drew up his figure magnificently.

"You may do what you like, Messieurs," he said gaily. "It is for you; my part is done. The prince is safe."

CHAPTER XIV.

After Five Years.

The window of the cell was small, but it was low enough so that a man standing could see from it the vast sky and the sea-line six miles away, and, by leaning close to the bars, the hill that sloped down into wooded country; beyond that the sand of the shore. The jailer stood close by the little window in the stormy sunset for a better light as he dropped the medicine.

"One—two," he counted the drops carefully up to nine, and then glanced at the prisoner on his cot in the corner, who tossed, and talked rapidly, disjointedly. "It is high time that the doctor saw him," the jailer spoke, half aloud. "If the governor had been here this would not have been allowed to run on. I am glad the governor is coming back."

With that the prisoner threw off the cover from his shoulders and sat up suddenly, with wild bright eyes staring at the jailer.

"Pietro!" he called in astonishment. "Why, my dear old Pietro!" and flung out his hands eagerly toward the man, and would have sprung from the bed to him.

But the jailer was at his side and held him down, yet gently. "Be quiet, signor," he said respectfully. "It is only old Battista; you will see if you look. Only Battista, who has taken care of you these five years."

The brilliant dark eyes stared at him hungrily; then with a sigh the light went out of them and the head fell on the pillow.

"Ah, Battista," he said, "my good Battista." A smile full of a subtle charm made the worn face bright. He spoke slowly. "I thought it was my friend—my best friend," he explained gently.

"Will the signor take the doctor's medicine?" Battista asked then, not much noticing the words, for the sick man was clearly light-headed, yet with a certain pleasant throb of memory which always moved within him at the name of Pietro. It happened that the name stood for some one dear to the jailer also. The signor took the medicine at once, like a good child.

"Will it make me better, do you think, Battista?" he asked earnestly.

"But yes, signor; the doctor is clever."

"I want to be better; I must get well, for I have work to do as soon as I come out of prison."

"Surely, signor. That will be soon now, I think, for it is five years; they will let you go soon, I believe," Battista lied kindly.

"You are good to me, Battista," the boy said, "and just now you gave me a great pleasure. It warms me yet to think of it, for, you see, I thought you were Pietro—my dear Pietro—the Marquis Zappi."

Battista, breathless, stared, stammered. "Whom—whom did you say, signor?"

But the prisoner had flashed into reason. The color went out of his face as the tide ebbs. "Battista, did I say a name? Battista—you will not betray me—you will not repeat that name? I would never have said it but that I was not quite steady. I must have been out of my head; I have never spoken his name before in this place. Oh, if I should bring danger to him! Battista, for God's sake, you will not repeat that name?"

Battista spoke low, glancing at the heavy iron door of the cell. "God forbid, signor," he whispered, "that I should speak, here in his own castle, the name of my young master."

There was a long silence. The prisoner and his jailer gazed at each other as if saying things beyond words. Then the boy put out his long hot fingers and caught the man's sleeve.

"Battista," he murmured, "Battista—is that true? Is it possible? Do you know—my Pietro?"

"Know him, signor?" Battista's deep voice was unsteady. "My fathers have served his for eight hundred years." The man was shaking with a loyalty long pent up, but Francois lifted his head, leaned on his elbow, and looked at him thoughtfully.

"But, Battista, I know you now; he has spoken to me of you; it was your son, the little Battista, who was his body-servant when they were children?"

"Yes, signor."

"I did not dream of it; I never knew what castle this was; I never dreamed of Castleforte; you would not tell me."

"I could not, signor. It was forbidden. It is forbidden. I am risking my life every minute."

"Go, Battista," and Francois pushed him away with weak hands. "Go quickly—you have been here too long. There might be suspicion. I could not live if I brought trouble on you."

"It is right so far, signor," Battista answered. "It is known you are ill; I must care for the sick ones a little. But I had better go now."

With that he slipped to his knees and lifted the feverish hands to his lips. "The friend of my young master," he said simply, but his voice broke on the words. The traditional faithfulness of centuries was strong in Battista; the Zappis had been good masters; one had been cared for and contented always; one was terrorized and ground down by these "Austrian swine;" the memory of the old masters, the personality of anyone connected with them, was sacred. Battista bowed his head over the hands in his own, then he stood up.

"I shall be back at bedtime, signor," he said quietly, and was gone.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam, Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

Maybe that if Eberhart is nominated in June, that John Lind may get back from Mexico in time to give him a race next fall, and if John could be induced to enter the fight, it would be good bye Adolph with a big G. Of course we are publishing a republican paper, but we always reserve the right to express our opinion.

The campaign for the nomination for governor, is progressing finely with only three candidates in the field in opposition to Eberhart. Of course Lee and James A. Peterson will get a few votes, but the main fight will center between Iverson and Eberhart, as neither one of the other candidates stand any more show to be nominated for governor of Minnesota, than an Eleven Towns farmer, and after the primaries all that they can say is "We also run."

Governor Eberhart's Economy Committee are beginning to talk about the lack of money to carry on their investigations, which is being advanced by the governor and others, with the expectation that the next legislature will reimburse the contributors. Of course that will mean an additional tax levy to raise the necessary money, so instead of decreasing the taxes this committee of political pop suckers will raise them but Adolph has got to get enough boarders loaded onto the State to vote him into office, and this committee can do a lot of pulling for Eberhart in the way of investigations. There is no one man in the state of Minnesota who better understands the necessity for a halt being called on this useless waste of money, and the tax levy being raised every year than S. G. Iverson, our present State Auditor. It is up to the people to require that their proposed members for election to the legislature, pledge themselves to economy so as to reduce this increase of tax levy, instead of voting for men who are proposing the appointment of more committees to be paid by the tax payers or in other and more plain language it has become necessary for the tax payers of this state to wake up to the fact, that there is too much travelling expenses and too little business economy in the present administration, and they should vote to change it.

HOW TO DO IT.

Some day, and the sooner the better, the Northwest must deal frankly with its question of vacant lands held by speculators. This is a matter which concerns the city even more largely than it does the country. Every city and every village has idle land in plenty, bearing little share of the taxation, waiting until the industry of the community has made it valuable. Every farmer knows of untilled land in his neighborhood which has steadily gone up as the roads and schools and houses and barns of the community have been built, and its ultimate sale has taken out of the neighborhood, very likely out of the state altogether, a sum representing the lifework of some man. The neighborhood, none too rich at best, has been compelled to give years of personal service in exchange for nothing save a small first investment and a trivial real estate tax. Meanwhile every man who has built a barn or cleared a forty has had his tax burden increased—has in effect been fined for building up the community, while the non-resident who lets his land lie idle is encouraged in that course by our tax system.

The natural remedy that occurs is to cut out the tax on improvements altogether, and to spread the cost of government over the land in proportion to its value. Under this system the improved eighty would pay exactly the same tax, and no more, than the idle eighty of like character across the road. In other words let us tax men, not for the use of land, but for the opportunity of use which they enjoy. This is entirely fair, and it would compel the speculator either to improve his farm or to sell it to someone who would do so. The result would be more neighbors, better roads, better schools, better social and business life, and less taxes. The way to fill up our idle acres is to let their owners pay their fair share of the tax burden.—Farm Stock and Home.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate. I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion, should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

(Paid Advertisement, Authorized by D. P. O'Neill, paid for at the regular rates.)

To the Voters of the new Sixty-Fifth District, composed of the counties of Pennington, Red Lake and Clearwater, I hereby announce myself as a candidate for the State Senate and solicit your support and votes at the Primary Election to be held June 16th, 1914.

Having been instrumental in securing additional representation, I will feel highly honored if selected as the first Senator from the new Sixty-Fifth District.

As Political Platforms have been eliminated by the Non-partison Primary Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking Legislative honors to declare themselves upon all public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the People of the State.

I would not favor an increase of the State tax for the purpose of developing State lands, but do most heartly favor the passage of the Constitutional Amendment, known as House File No. 1242, of which I am one of the Joint Authors, setting apart $250,000 from the School and Swamp Land Funds to be used as a revolving fund for the purpose of constructing Roads, Ditches and Fire Breaks in, through and around State Lands. This will not only be instrumental in increasing their value, but provide homes for men of families and put millions of acres, that are now bearing none of the burdens of Society upon the tax books, thus reducing materially the burdens of the poor settler adjacent to those lands.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota and the investment of the permanent funds of the State in improving our own State instead of loaning them to other States at low rate of interest.

I favor the creation of a Land Department for the State and the placing of all our natural resources under this Department. I also favor a thorough Soil Survey and proper classification and valuation of the State Lands and the placing of the lists with the County Auditors of the different Counties where any homeseeker may enter any unoccupied tract that suits him, instead of as now holding Auction Sales where speculators purchase over 75 per cent of the land. The State is spending Thousands of Dollars annually for an Immigration Board to induce people to come to Minnesota and, when a poor man with reasonable means arrives, he is told the State has over 8,000,000 acres of land, but there is none of it on sale today, that he must wait over six weeks or six months as the case may be, until a public sale is held. As the State now sells all the timber separate from the land reserves the mineral rights, no loss but an immense gain can come to the State from this policy as thousands of valuable citizens are lost to the State every year through this unbusiness like method. While I feel that the State Auditors have conducted the business of the State honestly and efficiently under the Constitution, still I hold the Auditors should be the Auditor and have check upon all Departments while now he checks himself in one of the most important Departments of the State, namely, the Land Department.

I favor an increase in the Royalties paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor the submission of the Liquor Question to a vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher Morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at lease have the opportunity of putting their views to the test.

I am in favor not only of Laws that will benefit rural communities but am for any and all Legislation that will benifit the farmer and business man. And also in addition the working man and woman who, being the weakers members of Society, require the strong arm of the State for their protection.

I favor the consolidation and reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interest of economy and the appointment of men on their merit under Civil Service Rules.

Thanking the voters of the Sixty-Fifth Legislative District for past favors and hoping that they will give due consideration to the platform herewith presented, I remain.

Most respectfully yours.
D. P. O'Neill.

RUSHFORD BOOSTS IVERSON.

(Lake City Graphic-Republican.)

The candidacy of S. G. Iverson for governor seems to have received a cordial welcome by the press of the state, judging from the comments. This, however, may mean much or little when the campaign opens. At any rate the newspaper men are willing to give most anybody a fair chance if their previous record warrants it, and there is no question as to Samuel's. His home town, Rushford, has organized the first Iverson club and has promised him loyal support from start to finish. That helps some and is encouraging. Not every home town does so well by their favorite sons, as we well know.

IVERSON STARTED THE MUSIC.

(Le Roy Independent.)

State politics is begining to command attention. State Auditor Iverson started the music with the announcement of his candidacy for the governorship and it is already well settled that Eberhart will try it again.

As between the two the Independent would pick Iverson, but there may be some one even better get into the race later. However, we hope there will not be such a multiplicity of candidates in the field as there was in the last campaign, for such a condition would only insure Eberhart's success again. Sam Iverson has made an excellent record as state auditor, is capable and honest and no doubt would be a credit to the state as its chief executive.

You can see by reading the U. S. Government report published on an inside page that Minnesota leads all the northwestern States as a corn and wheat producer.

The distance between the end of the new electric line railroad and Oklee will be about 21 miles so you see the Eleven Towns' farmers are not so awful far from a railroad.

We received a check for four years subscription this week, which reminded us that a lot of good payers are sometimes careless about paying the subscription to the local paper.

On Wednesday evening the wind changed to the northwest and blew a blizzard gale all day yesterday, which added to the intense cold made us forget our past pleasant winter weather and realize that the cold wave had again arrived to remind us that we are still living in northern Minnesota.

People who think the newspapers are not read, should be the P. M. at Sunbeam for a while, and see the volume of mail that will arrive at this office for any party whose name is mentioned in the most obscure corner of the paper, as going into any kind of business. Oh no noboby reads the papers.

A South Dakota widow, with five children captured a Manitoba bachelor farmer who was looking for a wife, in just two hours from the time she first saw him. They were married just two hours from the time of meeting, and now have the balance of their natural lives to fall in love with each other.

We received a personal letter from the Minneapolis candidate for governor last night, roasting us for expressing our opinion of the governor situation, but wait until after the primaries and you will see that the field of candidates will land in the same pit that Eberhart threw the crowd into two years ago that ran against him for governor, and by that time the people will conclude there is something wrong, elect the democratic nominee, and send Eberhart down to keep company with his friend Taft.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby announce myself as a candidate, at the primaries, for the office of Superintendent of Schools of Pennington County. Your support is respectfully solicited,

BIG FIRE AT THIEF RIVER FALLS.

Last Sunday noon fire broke out in the big Evenson block, and within a few hours the block was a mass of crumbled ruins.

The origin of the fire is not known, but it was thought to have started in the boiler room of the Evenson block, but this the janitor denies.

Chris Porter, one of the firemen was badly injured by a falling wall, also a Soo Conductor was injured by a falling ladder.

The Citizens National Bank located in the Evenson block lost all fixtures and everything not in their big safe. On the second floor of this block, Judge of Probae Michelet, O.A. Naplin and several other lawyers and physicians had their offices, which were all a total loss.

Laken's Department store, one of the new stores in the Evenson block was a total loss, but they had $14,000 insurance on their stock.

The total loss is estimated at about $50,000 with about $88,000 insurance.

MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RAILWAY,

THE FARMERS RAILWAY,

CHEAP AND RELIABLE TRANSPORTATION FOR ALL PRODUCTS OF THIS TERRITORY.

The Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway Company has commenced the construction of the first division of 20 miles running eastward from Thief River Falls to the Township of Goodridge. The company expects to put this 20 miles in operation not later than the First Day of September, 1914. Extensions from the end of the First Division will then be started and placed in operation as soon as possible.

This railway will afford to the farmers of this district the very best of railway service for transporting their products to market. Arrangements have already been made so that it will be possible to load cars at the stations of the Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway and ship these same cars without reloading to any point on any railroad in the United States, without any additional switching or transfer charges. For instance, in accordance with the rates as laid down at the present time by the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of the State of Minnesota, you can ship a carload of 600 bushels of wheat from Grygla to Duluth for only $2.16 more than from Thief River Falls to Duluth.

THE MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RAILWAY WILL BRING THE VERY BEST OF MARKETS. IT WILL INCREASE THE VALUE OF EVERY ACRE OF LAND IN THIS COMMUNITY. IT WILL MAKE FARMING HERE AS PROFITABLE AS IN ANY PART OF THE UNITED STATES.

Every land owner in this community should exert himself to secure this railway and should subscribe for at least one share of stock. The Company asks for no bonus. The stock will pay you a good rate of interest and prove a good investment. You can secure this railway in your immediate vicinity sooner by subscribing for some stock now.

STOCK WILL ONLY BE SOLD FOR THE FIRST TWENTY MILES.

INCREASE THE VALUE OF YOUR LAND AND THE VALUE OF YOR CROPS BY SUBSCRIBING FOR STOCK OF THE MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RVILWAY AND DO IT NOW.

WILSON GIVES TRUST VIEWS IN BRIEF MESSAGE

NO NOVEL OR SWEEPING MEASURES ARE NECESSARY IN DEALING WITH THE INTRICATE MATTER.

NO DESIRE TO UNSETTLE BUSINESS, SAYS PRESIDENT

Programme of Executive Founded On Common Conviction That "Private Monopoly is Indefensible and Intolerable"—Recommendations.

Washington, Jan. 20.—President Woodrow Wilson read his special message dealing with the trust question before the members of congress today.

The Message in Full.

Gentlemen of the Congress: In my report "on the state of the union," which I had the privilege of reading to you on the second of December, last, I ventured to reserve for discussion at a later date the subject of additional legislation regarding the very difficult and intricate matter of trusts and monopolies. The time now seems opportune to turn to that great question: not only because the currency legislation, which absorbed your attention and the attention of the country in December, is now disposed of, but also because opinion seems to be clearing about us with singular rapidity in this other great field of action.

Currency Field Cleared.

In the matter of the currency it cleared suddenly and very happily, after the much debated act was passed; in respect of the monopolies which have multiplied about us and in regard to the various means by which they have been organized and maintained, it seems to be coming to a clear and all but universal agreement in anticipation of our action as if by way of preparation, making the way easier to see and easier to set out upon with confidence and without confusion of counsel.

Mutual Understanding Urged.

Legislation has its atmosphere, like everything else, and the atmosphere of accommodation and mutual understanding which we now breathe with so much refreshment is matter of sincere congratulation. It ought to make our task very much less difficult and embarrassing than it would have been had we been obliged to continue to act amidst the atmosphere of suspicion and antagonism, which has so long made it impossible to approach such questions with dispassionate fairness.

Legislation is a business of interpretation not of origination; and it is now plain what the opinion is to which we must give effect in this matter. It is not recent or hasty opinion. It springs out of the experience of a whole generation. It has clarified itself by long contest and those who for a long time battled with it and sought to change it are now frankly and honorably yielding to it and seeking to conform their actions to it.

The great business men who organized and financed monopoly and those who administered it in actual everyday transactions have year after year, until now, either denied its existence or justified it as necessary for the effective maintenance and development of the vast business processes of the country in the modern circumstances of trade and manufacture and finance; but all the while opinion has made head against them. The average business man is convinced that the ways of liberty are also the ways of peace and the ways of success as well; and at last the masters of business on a great scale have begun to yield their preference and purpose, perhaps their judgment also, in honorable surrender.

Would Not Hamper Business.

What we are purposing to do, therefore, is happily, not to hamper or interfere with business, as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between business and government is over. We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America, to what we know to be the business conscience and heart of the land. The government and business men are ready to meet each other half way in a common effort to square business methods with both public opinion and the law. The best informed men of the business world condemn the methods and processes and consequences of monopoly as we condemn them; and the instinctive judgment of the vast majority of business men everywhere goes with them. We shall now be their spokesmen. That is the strength of our position and the sure prophecy of what will ensue when our reasonable work is done.

Seeks a Prudent Disposition.

When serious contest ends, when men unite in open and purpose, those who are to change their ways of business, joining with those who ask for the change, it is possible to effect it in the way in which prudent and thoughtful and patriotic men would wish to see it brought about, with as few, as slight, as easy and simple business readjustments as possible in the circumstances; nothing essential disturbed, nothing torn up by the roots, no parts rent asunder which can be left in wholesome combination. Fortunately no measures of sweeping or novel change are necessary. It will be understood that our object is not to unsettle business or anywhere seriously to break its established courses athwart. On the contrary we desire the laws we are now about to pass to be the bulwarks and safeguards of industry against the forces that have disturbed it. What we have to do can be done in a new spirit, in thoughtful moderation, without revolution of any untoward kind.

Private Monopoly is Indefensible.

We are all agreed that "private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable," and our programme is founded on that conviction. It will be a comprehensive but not a radical or unacceptable programme, and these are its items, the changes which opinion deliberately sanctions and for which business waits:

It waits with acquiescence, in the first place, for laws which will effectually prohibit and prevent such interlockings of the personnel of the directorates of great corporations—banks and railroads, industrial, commercial and public service bodies—as in effect result in making those who borrow and those who lend practically one and the same; those who sell and those who buy, but the same persons trading with one another under different names and in different combinations, and those who affect to compete in fact partners and masters of some whole field of business. Sufficient time should be allowed, of course, in which to effect these changes of organization without inconvenience or confusion.

More Than Negative Good.

Such a prohibition will work much more than a mere negative good by correcting the serious evils which have arisen because, for example, the men who have been the directing spirits of the great investment banks have usurped the place which belongs to independent industrial management in its own behoof. It will bring new men new energies, a new spirit of initiative, new blood, into the management of our great business enterprises. It will open the field of industrial development and origination to scores of men who have been obliged to serve when their abilities entitled them to direct. It will immensely hearten the young men coming on and will greatly enrich the business activities of the whole country.

In the second place, business men, as well as those who direct public affairs now recognize, and recognize with painful clearness, the great harm and injustice which has been done to many, if not all, of the great railroad systems of the country by the way in which they have been financed and their own distinctive interests subordinated to the interests of those who financed them and of other business enterprises which those men wished to promote.

Country Ready for Legislation.

The country is ready, therefore, to accept, and accept with relief, as well as approval, a law which will confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to superintend and regulate the financial operations by which the railroads are henceforth to be supplied with the money they need for their proper development to meet the rapidly growing requirements of the country for increased and improved facilities of transportation. We cannot postpone action in this matter without leaving the railroads exposed to many serious handicaps and hazards; and the prosperity of the railroads and the prosperity of the country are inseparably connected. Upon this question those who are chiefly responsible for the actual management and operation of the railroads have spoken very plainly and very earnestly with a purpose we ought to be quick to accept. It will be one step and a very important one, toward the necessary separation of the business of production from the business of transportation.

Business Has Suffered.

The business of the country awaits, also, has long awaited and has suffered because it could not obtain, further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing anti-trust law. Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of falling under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is. Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed. These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

And the business men of the country desire something more than that the menace of legal process in these matters be made explicit and intelligible. They desire the advice, the definite guidance and information which can be supplied by an administrative body, an interstate trade commission.

Country Would Approve.

The opinion of the country would instantly approve of such a commission. It would not wish to see it empowered to make terms with monopoly or in any sort to assume control of business, as if the government made itself responsible. It demands such a commission only as an indispensable instrument of information and publicity, as a clearing house for the facts by which both the public mind and the managers of great business undertakings should be guided, and as an instrumentality for doing justice to business where the processes of the courts or the natural forces of correction outside the courts are inadequate to adjust the remedy to the wrong in a way that will meet all the equities and circumstances of the case.

Producing industries, for example, which have passed the point up to which combination may be consistent with the public interest and the freedom of trade, cannot always be dissected into their component units as readily as railroad companies or similar organizations can be. Their dissolution by ordinary legal process may oftentimes involve financial consequences likely to overwhelm the security market and bring upon it breakdowns and confusion. There ought to be an administrative commission capable of directing and shaping such corrective processes, not only in aid of the courts, but also by independent suggestion, if necessary.

To Meet Business Half-Way.

Inasmuch as our object and the spirit of our action in these matters is to meet business half-way in its processes of self-correction and disturb its legitimate course as little as possible, we ought to see to it, and the judgment of practical and sagacious men of affairs everywhere would applaud us if we did see to it, that penalties and punishments should fall, not upon business itself, to its confusion and interruption, but upon the individuals who use the instrumentalities of business to do things which public policy and sound business practice condemn.

Every act of business is done at the command or upon the initiative of some ascertainable person or group of persons. These should be held individually responsible and the punishment should fall upon them, not upon the business organization of which they make illegal use. It should be one of the main objects of our legislation to divest such persons of their corporate cloak and deal with them as with those who do not represent their corporations, but merely by deliberate intention break the law. Business men the country through would, I am sure, applaud us if we were to take effectual steps to see that the officers and directors of great business bodies were prevented from bringing them and the business of the country into disrepute and danger.

Other Questions Remain.

Other questions remain which will need very thoughtful and practical treatment. Enterprises, in these modern days of great individual fortunes, are oftentimes interlocked, not by being under the control of the same directors, but by the fact that the greater part of their corporate stock is owned by a single person or group of persons who are in some way intimately related in interest. We are agreed, I take it, that holding companies should be prohibited, but what of the controlling private ownership of individuals or actually co-operative groups of individuals? Shall the private owners of capital stock be suffered to be themselves in effect holding companies? We do not wish, I suppose, to forbid the purchase of stocks by any person who pleases to buy them in such quantities as he can afford, or in any way arbitrarily to limit the sale of stocks to bona fide purchasers. Shall we require the owners of stock, when their voting power in several companies which ought to be dependent of one another would constitute actual control, to make election in which of them they will exercise their right to vote? This question I venture for your consideration.

Others Are Injured.

There is another matter in which imperative consideration of justice and fair play suggest thoughtful remedial action. Not only do many of the combinations effected or sought to be effected in the industrial world work an injustice upon the public in general; they also directly and seriously injure the individuals who are put out of business in one unfair way or another by the many dislodging and exterminating forces of combinations. I hope that we shall agree in giving private individuals who claim to have been injured by these processes the right to found their suits for redress upon the facts and judgments proved and entered in suits by the government where the government has upon its own initiative sued the combinations complained of and won its suit, and that the statute of limitations shall be suffered to run against such litigants only from the date of the conclusion of the government's action. It is not fair that the private litigant should be obliged to set up and establish again the facts which the government has proved. He can not afford, he has not the power, to make use of such processes of inquiry as the government has command of. Thus shall individual justice be done while the processes of business are rectified and squared with the general conscience.

I have laid the case before you, no doubt as it lies in your own mind, as it lies in the thought of the country. What must every candid man say of the suggestions I have laid before you, of the plain obligations of which I have reminded you? That these are new things for which the country is not prepared? No; but that they are old things, now familiar, and must of course be undertaken if we are to square our laws with the thought and desire of the country. Until these things are done, conscientious business men the country over will be unsatisfied. They are in these things our mentors and colleagues. We are now about to write the additional articles of our constitution of peace—the peace that is honor and freedom and prosperity.

FRAME FOUR BILLS TO CURB "TRUSTS"

MEASURE APPROVED BY WILSON HAS NO ESCAPE LOOPHOLES.

TO BECOME LAWS VERY SOON

Penalty for Restraint of Commerce, Unfair Business and Interlocking Directorates — Ample Provisions Made for Trade Commission.

Washington, Jan. 23.—The administration's trust bills, embodying the program laid down by the president in his recent message, have been presented to congress.

The bills have received the approval of Mr. Wilson and the Democratic leaders of both houses of congress. With little modification they will be enacted into law. Their purposes are:

1. Definition of unlawful monopoly or restraints of trade.
2. Prohibition of unfair trade practice.
3. Creation of an interstate trade commission.
4. Regulation of corporation directorates and prohibition of interlocking directorates.

Unlawful Monopoly Defined.

Unlawful monopoly is defined as any combination or agreement between corporations, firms, or persons designed for the following purposes:

1. To create or carry out restrictions in trade or to acquire a monopoly in any interstate trade, business, or commerce.
2. To limit or reduce the production or increase the price of merchandise or of any commodity.
3. To prevent competition in manufacturing, making, transporting, selling, or purchasing of merchandise, produce, or any commodity.
4. To make any agreement, enten into any arrangement, or arrive at any understanding by which they, directly or indirectly, undertake to prevent a free and unrestricted competition among themselves or among any purchasers or consumers in the sale, production, or transportation of any product, article, or commodity.

The penalty for violation of the law is fixed at not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for one year or both.

Guilt is made personal through a section that whenever a corporation shall be guilty of the violation of the law the offense shall be deemed to cover the individual directors, officers, and agents of such corporation, as authorizing, ordering, or doing the prohibited acts, and they shall be punished as prescribed above.

A paragraph prohibiting holding companies is to be added to this measure.

Covers Unfair Trade Practices.

The bill forbidding unfair trade practices declares that to discriminate in price, between different purchasers of commodities, with the purpose or intent to injure or destroy a competitor, either of the purchaser or of the seller, shall be deemed an attempt to monopolize interstate commerce.

It is specifically declared that the law is not intended to prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities "on account of difference in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation."

Further, it is prescribed that nothing contained in the act shall prevent persons from selecting their own customers, "but this provision shall not authorize the owner or operator of any mine engaged in selling its product in interstate or foreign commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell the same to a responsible person, firm, or corporation, who applies to purchase."

An attempt at monopoly also is declared to exist for any person to make a sale of goods, wares, or merchandise or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from or rebate upon such price, on the condition or understanding that the purchaser thereof shall not deal in the goods, wares, or merchandise of a competitor or competitors of the seller.

Deals With Damage Suits.

A judgment against any defendant in a suit brought under the anti-trust law the bill provides shall constitute as against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts and be conclusive as to the same issues of law in favor of any other party in any other proceeding brought under and involving the provisions of the law.

For the benefit of parties injured in their business or property, by any person or corporation found guilty of violating the law the statute of limitations applicable to such cases shall be suspended.

Injunctive relief is accorded against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the act under the same conditions and principles that injunctive relief against threatened conduct which will cause loss or damage is granted by courts of equity.

It is required that a proper bond shall be executed against damages for an injunction improvidently granted, and it must be shown that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate.

Hits Interlocking Directorates.

Concerning directorates, the bill on that subject, which is to become effective two years from date of approval of the act, provides:

"No person engaged as an individual or as a member of a partnership or as a director or other officer of a corporation in the business of selling railroad cars or locomotives, or railroad rails or structural steel, or mining or selling coal, or conducting a bank or trust company, shall act as a director or other officer or employe of any railroad or other public service corporation which conducts an interstate business.

"No person shall at the same time be a director or other officer or employe in two or more federal reserve banks, national banks, or banking associations, or other banks or trust companies which are members of any reserve bank; and a private banker and a person who is a director in any state bank or trust company not operating under the provisions of the recent currency law shall not be eligible to serve as a director in any bank or banking association or trust company operating under the provisions of the law."

Violation of these sections is made punishable by a fine of $100 a day, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

If any two or more corporations have common director or directors, the fact shall be conclusive evidence that there exists a real competition between such corporation and such elimination of competition shall be construed as a restraint of interstate trade and be treated accordingly.

The trade commission bill provides for commission of five members, with the commissioner of corporations as chairman, and transfers all the existing powers of the bureau of corporations to the commission.

The principal and most important duty the commission besides conducting investigations will be to aid the courts when requested in the formation of decrees of dissolution.

With this in view, the bill empowers he court to refer any part of pending litigation to the commission, including the proposed decree, for information and advice.

Much Criticism for Bills.

The trust bills as framed will be the subject of sharp criticism on the part of progressives of all parties who claim they do not go far enough. It will be declared that the definition of monopoly remains inadequate that the prohibition of unfair trade practice does not cover this evil in our economic life that interlocking stock control is not covered and that the powers of the proposed trade commission are insufficient.

It is interesting to note that the proposal to place the burden of proof upon a combination believed to be violating the law has been omitted. No attempt is made to prevent or destroy monopoly based on patents. The greatest difficulty exerienced in the effective enforcement of the law has been found to be in the unwillingness of the courts to impose jail penalty. It remains optional under the proposed measures wiht the courts to fine or imprison.

Trade Board May Disappoint.

In connection with the trade commission President Wilson declared in his message that the country "demands such a commission only as an indispensable instrument of information and publicity as a clearing house for the facts by which both the public mind and the managers of great business undertakings should be guided."

The bill prescribes that the commission acts are to constitute a "public record" but the body is authorized to make public the information "in such form and to such extent as may be necessary" or "by direction of the attorney general."

It is apparent that the public mind cannot be guided unless it has the facts, and then it will not get unless the commission or the attorney general deems it politic.

In other words, public hearings will not be held as they are held by the interstate commerce commission.

Settlement of Differences.

The most important feature of the bill is that which legalizes the policy of the administration of terminating an unlawful condition by agreement between the combination attacked and the attorney general.

This feature is comprehended under a section which requires the commission, upon the request of the attorney general or any corporation affected, to investigate whether a combination is violating the law. In case the commission should find the violation to exist it must report to the attorney general a statement of the objectionable acts and transactions and the readjustments necessary for the offending combination to conform to the law.

These conclusions are to be "advisory to the attorney general in terminating by agreement with the corporation affected or by suing the said unlawful conduct or condition."

In other words, whatever may be the agreement made by the attorney general with the combination investigated, it will give the reorganized combination legal standing, so long as it conforms to the term of the agreement.

Thus it is proposed to place by law a tremendous power in the hands of the attorney general. This power has been assumed to attorneys general and particularly so by Mr. McReynolds;

Will Give Courts Advice.

In a statement accompanying the bill made by Congressman Clayton, chairman of the house judiciary committee, it is said that the "principal and most important duty of the commission, besides conducting investigations, will be to aid the courts, when requested, in the formation of decrees of dissolution.

"CASCARETS" FOR LIVER; BOWELS

No sick headache, biliousness, bad taste or constipation by morning.

Get a 10-cent box.

Are you keeping your bowels, liver, and stomach clean, pure and fresh with Cascarets, or merely forcing a passageway every few days with Salts, Cathartic Pills, Castor Oil or Purgative Waters?

Stop having a bowel wash-day. Let Cascarets thoroughly cleanse and regulate the stomach, remove the sour and fermenting food and foul gases, take the excess bile from the liver and carry out of the system all the constipated waste matter and poisons in the bowels.

A Cascaret to-night will make you feel great by morning. They work while you sleep—never gripe, sicken or cause any inconvenience, and cost only 10 cents a box from your store. Millions of men and women take a Cascaret now and then and never have Headache, Biliousness, Coated Tongue, Indigestion, Sour Stomach or Constipation. Adv.

WOMAN IN BAD CONDITION

Restored To Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Montpelier, Vt. — "We have great faith in your remedies. I was very irregular and was tired and sleepy all the time, would have cold chills, and my hands and feet would bloat. My stomach bothered me, I had pain in my side and a bad headache most of the time. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done me lots of good and I now feel fine. I am regular, my stomach is better and my pains have all left me. You can use my name if you like. I am proud of what your remedies have done for me." — Mrs. MARY GAUTHIER, 21 Ridge St., Montpelier, Vt.

An Honest Dependable Medicine

It must be admitted by every fair-minded, intelligent person, that a medicine could not live and grow in popularity for nearly forty years, and to-day hold a record for thousands upon thousands of actual cures, as has Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, without possessing great virtue and actual worth. Such medicines must be looked upon and termed both standard and dependable by every thinking person.

If you have the slightest doubt that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will help you, write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman, and held in strict confidence.

ENDS BACKACHE AND KIDNEY DISORDERS

Croxone Helps Lifeless Organs Regain Health, Strength and Activity.

It is useless, dangerous and unnecessary to be tortured with the digging, twisting pains of backache or suffer disagreeable kidney and bladder disorders when Croxone is guaranteed to promptly and surely relieve all such misery.

Croxone masters these troubles because it quickly reaches the cause of the disease. It soaks right into the stopped-up, inactive kidneys, through the membranes and linings; cleans out the little filtering glands; neutralizes and dissolves the poisonous uric acid and makes the kidneys filter and sift from the blood the waste and poisonous matter that clog the system and cause such troubles.

It does not matter whether you have but slight symptoms or a chronic, aggravated case, it is practically impossible to take Croxone without results.

An original package of Croxone costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if you are not entirely satisfied the very first time you use it.—Adv.

THE RIGHT SOAP FOR BABY'S SKIN

In the care of baby's skin and hair, Cuticura Soap is the mother's favorite. Not only is it unrivaled in purity and refreshing fragrance, but its gentle emollient properties are usually sufficient to allay minor irritations, remove redness, roughness and chafing, soothe sensitive conditions, and promote skin and hair health generally. Assisted by Cuticura Ointment, it is most valuable in the treatment of eczemas, rashes and itching, burning infantile eruptions. Cuticura Soap wears to a wafer, often outlasting several cakes of ordinary soap and making its use most economical.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free, with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston."—Adv.

Finger Prints Identify.

Taking of the finger print system for the identification of criminals, a Scotland Yard detective remarked the other day that, although no system is infallible, the police, given a finger print of a man who has been through their hands, will tell you who he is in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand. Furthermore, it is a matter of indifference to the English police by which finger or thumb the print is made; it can be easily traced. It was pointed out that in France the police depend to a great extent on physical measurement for identification, but while measurements are always taken by Scotland Yard, they are only regarded as of secondary importance.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

DAIRYMEN ELECT OSAKIS MAN HEAD

CHRIS. HEEN IS MADE PRESIDENT AT CLOSE OF ROUSING STATE MEETING.

PROGRAM DISPLAYED VARIETY

Controversy Over Dual-Purpose Cow—Play Staged by Farm School Students—Eberhart Speaks at Banquet.

Willmar.—The annual convention of the Minnesota State Dairymen's association adjourned after electing officers for the ensuing year as follows: President, Chris. Heen, of Osakis; first vice president, Edward H. Ulrich, of Biscay; second vice president, F. M. Wolfe, Montevideo; secretary, F. D. Currier, Nicollet; treasurer, J. M. Jack, of Stanton.

Constitution Is Changed.

A change of the constitution was voted by which at future conventions a primary vote will be taken the two first days for officers, who will then be selected from those having the highest plurality vote.

A dramatic feature was the controversy on the dual-purpose cow. Owing to the serious illness of his son, W. F. Schilling of Northfield, was unable to be present. His paper on the subject was read by Herman Roe of Northfield. In the discussion which followed D. E. Willard of the Great Northern development department championed the dual-purpose cow, while Colonel R. A. Wilkinson of Lake Elmo led the dairymen's side of the debate. There were several speakers and some feeling developed.

Play Is Given.

Student actors of the Minnesota agricultural college presented the rural comedy, "Back to the Farm." The play was thoroughly enjoyed by an audience which occupied every seat. About 250 persons were turned away at the box office for the lack of room. The moving pictures taken at the corn and alfalfa show at Morris were shown as a special feature and made a hit.

Flint Starts Interesting Discussion.

R. F. Flint of Bismarck, dairy commissioner of North Dakota, spoke on "What Co-operation Could Do for North Dakota." He told how cement silos are being constructed on a co-operative plan by which their cost had been materially reduced.

Other portions of his address precipitated a discussion of co-operative marketing of products. Colonel R. A. Wilkinson spoke in defense of the Society of Equity and its aims to reduce the cost of placing farm products in the hands of the consumers. Farmers have too long submitted to the injustice of having middlemen lay the blame for the high cost of living on the prices paid to the farmers. He said that when farmers do all the work of caring for the cows, the milking, hauling to the station and paying the freight to the big centers, and then only receive half and even less of what the consumers in the cities pay the distributers, the men on the farms are not getting their just share. They do as much work if not more than the distributers and then besides must invest money in cows and pay for the feed they eat.

Eberhart Speaks at Banquet.

Friday night the dairymen were guests at a banquet held by the Willmar Commercial club. Four hundred persons were seated at the tables. It was a social session at which wit and hard facts were blended into a very enjoyable time. Music was furnished by local talent and speeches were made by Governor Eberhart and Sam Haugdahl, who won the gold medal for the best butter at the Paris exposition.

Benson Land Men Bound Over.

Benson.—At a hearing before Justice J. C. Collins Martin J. Lee and L. P. Peterson were bound over to await the action of the grand jury on the charge of grand larceny in the third degree. The warrant was issued upon complaint of County Attorney Thornton, charging the defendants with having obtained money upon false representations in the sale of land by the Minnesota Investment company and the Homestead Land company, of which they are officers. They furnished bonds.

MASONS ELECT OFFICERS

Denfeld Chosen Grand Master to Succeed Laird—Banquet Ends Deliberations at St. Paul.

St. Paul. — The sixty-first annual communication of the Grand Lodge of Minnesota Masons closed at Masonic temple with the election of Robert E. Denfeld of Duluth as grand master to succeed W. Hayes Laird of Winona. Mr. Denfeld was deputy grand master.

Other officers elected are: Harry M. Burnham, Jackson, deputy grand master; Alfred G. Pinkham, St. Paul, senior grand warden; Alfred Berg, Spooner, junior grand warden; David W. Knowlton, Minneapolis, grand treasurer; John Fishel, St. Paul, grand secretary.

The next annual communication will be held here.

Gideon S. Ives, president of the Masonic Home association, in his annual report to the grand lodge of Masons, declared that the construction of a new home is arousing much enthusiasm. More than $35,000 has been raised thus far, President Ives said.

Resolutions were adopted by the grand lodge in favor of an active campaign to raise $100,000, the balance needed before work can be begun on the new building. An appropriation of $25,000 by the grand lodge is urged in President Ives' report.

It was also decided to affiliate with the Minnesota Peace society and to appoint delegates to attend its sessions. A resolution to this effect offered by President Ives was unanimously adopted. This is the first organization to affiliate officially with the new Peace society.

The closing event of the communication was the banquet of the Grand Masters' association at the Hotel Ryan.

Twenty Masons who have "gone through the chairs" attended the affair, which was presided over by Judge Calvin C. Brown.

CROOKSTON TO BOOM CLUB

Commercial Organization's Membership to Be Increased to 1,000 in a Week.

Crookston. — Beginning Monday, Feb. 9, the Crookston Commercial club will start a membership campaign with with a view of increasing the list from 300 to 1,000 members, the work to be done by the following Saturday night.

A commercial club secretary is to be employed and will devote his entire time to the work. Committees are now working on several manufacturing propositions for which deals have practically been closed, and conditions generally are such that a forward movement is a certainty, not in the shape of a boom, but of a constructive period of a substantial nature.

The first broadside of inquiries regarding the Northwestern Minnesota Farm Crop Show has been received, and General Chairman C. G. Selvig had to be provided with a special stenographer by the commercial club to assist Secretary O. I Bergh in answering letters and mailing premium lists. Active committees are at work in Clay, Clearwater, Becker, Beltrami, Hubbard, Kittson, Mahnoman, Marshall, Norman, Pennington, Polk, Red Lake, and Roseau counties, all of which will have county contests here for cash premiums separate from the big show prizes. The exhibits will reach 2,000, according to reports received from the various county committees.

MAN KNEW DEATH WAS NEAR

Told His Fellow Employes of Suspicions Before Double Marital Tragedy.

St. Paul.—August H. Taverna, who was killed by his wife just before she turned her weapon upon herself and committed suicide, expected death at the woman's hands, and ten minutes before the shooting he told his fellow employes of his fears that his wife would kill him.

At the store of G. Sommers & Co., where he was employed as a driver, Taverna declared that he might be going to his death, but he set out with a jest and a smile. As he drove away he told the other men he preferred to die rather than show a "yellow streak."

Within ten minutes he had been mortally wounded by the woman, who then turned her weapon upon herself and lay dead within a few feet of her husband. Taverna died in the hospital a few hours after the shooting.

That the double tragedy was the result of a final quarrel and the departure of Taverna from the home is the belief of Coroner Jones and the police.

Talks Too Long to Sweetheart.

Minneapolis. — Roy Peterson, 516 Eighth street south, talked so long over the telephone at a downtown candy store, to his "girl," late Saturday night, that they locked up the store with him inside. When Peterson attempted to emerge he was taken for a burglar by the few late pedestrians. "I'm locked in the store; please let me out," was the wail Captain Merrick's desk at police headquarters received.

He was released when Merrick found the tale was true.

McDonald Mine Case on Trial.

Grand Rapids.—The case wherein Malcolm McDonald of Minneapolis seeks to have set aside a contract with Mrs. Amber McMillan, whereby the latter was to receive a certain percentage of the royalties from the Brae mine near Nashwauk, in this county, is on trial before Judge C. W. Stanton at an adjourned session of the district court here. The case promises to be long drawn out and bitterly contested.

"No-License" for Granite Falls.

Granite Falls.—The municipal election was a very spirited affair, the "wets" and "drys" doing everything in their power to win. No-license carried by thirty-two majority. The following city ticket was elected: Mayor, E. C. Hawkins; clerk, C. M. Marcuson; treasurer, W. L. Kraemer; aldermen, T. H. Brown, Gunder Moe and James Bogle; city justices, C. M. Marcuson and C. A. Bennett; constable, H. A. Mikkelson; assessor, first ward, C. A. Stonne; second ward, O. O. Lende.

DEPENDED ON HIS FRIENDS

Good Business Argument in Opposition to a Request for Reduction of Price.

A man seeking to purchase a new hat visited a haberdashery shop the other day with the proprietor of which he was on very intimate terms. After trying on several of the latest fashions he casually inquired the price of the hat. He was informed that it was sold at $3.

"Isn't that rather steep?" remarked the customer. "Isn't it possible for you to make a reduction for me? I have been dealing with you for the past ten years, and it seems to me that the price is a trifle high."

"It is impossible for me to lower my price," curtly replied the proprietor.

"Now, my dear man," the other again asked, "can't you make some concessions for an old friend?"

"Because of our friendship you want me to make a reduction," said the owner, dismissing the subject. "Don't you know that I depend upon the support of my friends, because my enemies don't patronize me?"

Historic Tree Cut Down.

The old "Court" tree on Kingsborough hill, in the center of the Isle of Sheppey, has been cut down. For hundreds of years courts were held under the tree verey Whit Monday, only being discontinued in 1856, when the King's ferry was replaced by a bridge. From time immemorial the "annual general court and law day in the king's name" was held before the steward of Kingsborough, and the homage was there sworn for the choice of the constable, who held jurisdiction over the Island of Sheppey. The election of ferry warden and ferryman took place under the old tree, and matters relating to the ferry between Sheppey and the mainland were here discussed. It is believed that courts were held at the very spot on Kingsborough hill from the earliest Saxon times.—London Mail.

Deaths Sudden Visitation.

An English minister named Butler is said to have witnessed the following: "In the town of Everdon ten harvesters had sought refuge under a hedge during a storm. Lightning struck and killed four, who were left as petrified. One was found holding in his finger the snuff which he was about to take. Another had a little dead dog on his knees and had one hand on the animal's head, while holding in the other hand some bread with which he had been feeding it. A third was sitting with his eyes open and his head turned toward the storm."

400,000 Settlers a Year
160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position.

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessable a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

The Essayan Statue

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

I like to remember interludes in Nikolai's series of conspiracies and vengeance, when he allowed his subtle humor to play like a lambent flame about his imagination, when tragedy turned comedy and success was not purchased by tears. The case of the Essayan statue well illustrates the lighter side of Nikolai's nature.

Everybody in Boston came to know Essayan after he formed the famous combination in corn. He must have made millions; and from the humble post of editor of a little revolutionary Armenian sheet, he became one of the city's leading bankers. Simultaneously his views underwent a change, as Nikolai discovered when he called on him.

"What?" shouted Essayan. "Contribute fifty thousand dollars to the revolutionary party? You must be crazy."

"Six months ago," said Nikolai thoughtfully, "you were bawling for vengeance upon Russia through the columns of your newspaper, and begging subscriptions from your Armenian compatriots against the tyrant of your country."

Essayan stroked his paunch, chuckling.

"Maybe I did," he admitted. "But now I am a millionaire. My views have changed."

Nikolai looked round. We were seated in Essayan's private museum, in which he stored his statues. Essayan had gone in for culture. His collection must have been worth millions. Treasures of Greece and Rome adorned his galleries; there was an original Venus of Praxiteles, a Hermes by Phidias; bas-reliefs and friezes had been stripped for the banker from many an ancient temple. Nikolai frowned angrily.

"You must have spent five millions on that collection of yours," he said.

"Twelve millions," said Essayan suavely. "And all old, broken things at that. They tell me that my Hermes hadn't a head. They tell me that they're just as valuable when every statue has some part missing. I don't understand it myself—but they cost twelve millions."

Nikolai led him on to talk of his new hobby. It was evident that the Armenian took only a shadowy interest in the art side of his collection. He did not, in fact, remember whether it was his Apollo that had the missing arm or his Jupitor whose leg was gone. "But Berg knows," said the banker. "Berg's my art expert in London, and what he says goes. He's sending me a sample of old Egyptian mummies that's going to cost me half a million."

"Now, Mr. Essayan," said Nikolai, "if you can spare twelve millions for your confounded art hobby you can give me fifty thousand for the Armenian cause."
blandly.

"Yet I'll wager you that before the year is out I'll sell you one of your own statues out of this gallery for three times the amount I've asked you."

"No, you won't," answered the banker placidly, "because I know you, and from this moment my museum's going to be bolted and barred and guarded, and nobody's going to enter. See?"

Nikolai could with difficulty restrain his indignation when we were outside.

"The selfish hog!" he muttered. "He spends twelve millions on that stuff when fifty thousand would rebuild those villages that the Russians burned last year, leaving hundreds of his countrymen homeless. Well, Summers, we'll win three times that amount and teach the scoundrel a lesson."

"Nikolai," I said, "I confess that breaking into a banker's house in Boston does not appeal to me. It isn't feasible. This is America, and what can be done in Europe won't go here."

"I'll do the breaking in," said Nikolai. "Or, rather, I shall be carried into the gallery in state and requested to spend the night there alone by Mr. Essayan. All you will be required to do will be to catch the statue in a blanket when I throw it out."

I knew that some audacious scheme had already been devised by my companion, but Nikolai refused to deliver himself of it. The year had several months to run and for two months we did nothing, except occasionally to wander in the neighborhood of the banker's house. Once we encountered Essayan as he was leaving his front door.

"Ha!" he snorted. "When are you going to sell me my own statue, what?" He led us back into the house. "Look!" he said. "You shall be warmly welcomed, gentlemen."

The door that led to the museum had been secured with iron bars, each of which terminated in a padlock. Essayan showed us a series of electric wires.

"They communicate with the police department, the private watchman's office, my own room, and the fire department. I shall expect you—soon?"

"Some time this year," Nikolai answered. "Have you got your cargo of mummies yet, Mr. Essayan?"

"Next month I expect them," answered the banker. "Now shoo! Go away. You make me feel tired."

On the following Saturday Nikolai and I sailed for England. It was on shipboard that he unfolded his plans.

"We must anticipate those mummies," he said. "Now, Summers, to let in a light upon your brain, I intend to enter Essayan's house disguised as an Egyptian king."

"A mummy?" I asked, bewildered.

"Yes. Mummies can be procured easily in London. I shall simply remove the body, wrap myself in the spiced windings, enclosing a very modern piece of papyrus recounting the history of my undertaking, bore a neat breathing hole in the case, and ship myself to Boston. You will take me in your stateroom on the voyage back, and I trust that you will let me out of my case at times for a little fresh air and exercise. The difficult part will be after we reach Boston harbor. I shall prepare for a stay of twenty-four hours or more at the custom house by making myself insensible with opium or some drug, to while away the time and prevent a feeling of cramp from lying in my case. I shall be consigned to Mr. Essayan, our fat Armenian friend, and I have no doubt that he will consider me to be from Berg, his art expert on the other side, and welcome me with open arms. Of course he will deposit me in his museum, where I hope to accomplish my undertaking."

"But Essayan will recognize the statue," I objected.

"Neither Essayan nor Berg himself will recognize it," Nikolai answered.

We readily procured a mummy in London, and, on the night before our return journey, Nikolai gave me my final instructions.

"All you will have to do," he said, "will be to wait at the back of the house with a blanket and catch what I shall throw out to you. You will have a pony trap in waiting—or perhaps it would be still better to be in the guise of the collector of waste from barrels. In this way you will not be under suspicion. You will wait, of course, until the watchman has made his round; then I shall throw down the statue."

We unwrapped the mummy from its fastenings. I confess it was a somewhat gruesome undertaking, and when finally we stood looking down upon the features of that ancient Egyptian, I detected in it an uncanny resemblance to Nikolai. There was the same high forehead, the same eagle nose; moreover, the proportions, shriveled though they were, were little short of Nikolai's. He laughed.

"Reincarnation?" he said, smiling down on the grotesque thing. "Well, if so, my worthy ancestor in the flesh, we shall put you to good purpose."

We left the mummy in our rooms—there was no way to dispose of it—and Nikolai got into the box. I wrapped the windings round him and placed a pillow beneath his head. Then, having bored a number of holes in the case, which I rubbed with a pigment to make them appear as though they were the product of time, I put on the lid.

"How do you feel?" I asked.

"Well, but stuffy," came Nikolai's answer faintly from within the case. Then he called to me to raise the lid.

"For heaven's sake do not forget to lay by a goodly supply of food for my use in your stateroom," he said. "As you may have observed, I am a great trencherman. Now shut her down."

He tested the air for half an hour and found it breathable. Then he emerged and we made our final dispositions.

On the following day I boarded the Hispaniola, sailing from Liverpool for Boston. The mummy was hoisted on board, and a little while afterward Nikolai came to life within my stateroom. The voyage across the Atlantic was uneventful, and, although my mummy caused considerable talk among the stewards, nobody suspected that it contained a very much up-to-date passenger. I had given instructions that the case should be shipped to Essayan's house; I marked the outside as though it had come from Berg, and, having left Nikolai with a supply of water and some concentrated food, I bade him farewell. He had decided, at my instigation, rather to endure the discomfort of the long wait patiently, than to take a drug.

We arrived on Sunday. The case would be delivered on the following morning, Nikolai said, and the customs officers promised to hurry it through. I forget what duty I paid; it was well worth it. On Monday night, about the hour of twelve, Nikolai was to emerge from the mummy case, select his statue and throw it down to me.

Then I remembered that the hour would be too early for the advent of the ash-barrel collector. I hit on a new plan. I would drive past the back of the house in sight of the watchman, in an automobile; I would pretend that the machine had broken down, and would stop in the street for repairs. No crowd would be likely to assemble at such an hour in that secluded district; and the watchman would be compelled to make the round of the house.

This plan I carried into effect. The banker was in the country, I had learned, and the house deserted. It would be the easiest matter to accomplish my scheme. Soon after midnight I drove up toward Essayan's house. I duly stopped the machine, uttered an exclamation of anger, descended, and burrowed into the ground beneath it. As I had anticipated, the watchman paused on his round.

"Broken down?" he inquired sympathetically.

"I'm not doing this for fun," I answered, with feigned anger.

He watched me for a while and then resumed his patrol of the house. The moment that he disappeared I sprang from under the machine, seized the blanket I had brought, and whistled twice, the appointed signal. Then, looking up, I saw Nikolai's head appear from an upper window.

Nikolai motioned with his hands; I spread the blanket and braced myself to receive the weight of the statue. To my astonishment, however, I received, not what I had expected, but an oblate sphere, that hurtled heavily through the air and descended into the receptacle. I glanced at it hastily. It was the fore part of a female head—of course in marble.

I laid it down stupidly and glanced up again. Once more an object descended. This time it was a leg—a marble leg, worthy of an Apollo. I caught it and hastened beneath the automobile again, concealing my treasures, just in time to hear the watchman's tramp as he came round the corner. I pretended to be very busy with the machine. He halted for a moment, glanced at me, and again resumed his beat.

But why was Nikolai cutting up the statue piecemeal?

The next object that came down to me was a single hand. I looked up; I thought I saw Nikolai smiling. The situation was an absurd one.

"Don't cut it up so fine," I whispered. I do not know whether he heard. A single finger next came down; but an instant later I was staggering under the weight of a torso and the hind part of a head, which seemed to me to be the complimentary piece of the first one that had descended. Again I sought the safety of the bottom of the automobile.

The watchman paused so long this time that I thought best to crawl out.

"It's the carbureter," I explained, with a very dim understanding of the meaning of the term. "And I think my spark plug's fouled. Do you know of any repair shop in the neighborhood?"

"Not at this time of the night," answered the watchman, gloating, as it seemed to me, over my misfortune. This was his revenge for my previous reception of his sympathetic inquiries. "Oh, well, I'll start the blamed thing somehow," I answered, and began fumbling the mechanism again.

He passed on upon his beat, and I looked up to Nikolai. A forearm came whizzing through the air; an arm; a second leg; then the greater part of a trunk; finally two ears. And then, as I still waited, I saw Nikolai perched upon the windowsill. I motioned him back and crawled beneath the automobile again.

This time the watchman hardly looked at me. When he was gone I bundled the items into the machine. I looked up. Nikolai was throwing out a rope. I caught the end as he signaled me and waited, my heart beating fast, for his descent. He came down at a terrific pace and landed heavily upon the ground, his hands bleeding from the contact with the rope. A filmy white dust had settled all over him, giving him the appearance of a miller. He sprang into the machine.

"Let her go, Summers," he cried, and, even as he spoke, the watchman came back before his time and in an opposite direction. He had evidently suspected something. One glance at Nikolai was sufficient for his suspicions to leap into full activity. He snatched a whistle from his neck and placed it to his lips.

Before he could blow Nikolai had seized him by the throat and grasped his hands. "Into the auto with him, Summers," he cried in a low, penetrating whisper. "Give a hand." I pulled the struggling man inside. "Now let her go," Nikolai cried, "Hurry, man."

And then a lamentable aspect of our situation made itself manifest. The automobile had actually broken down. I had disarranged the gear in some manner. It would not stir. No sound came from the engine.

"Crank her, crank her," cried Nikolai, still struggling with the watchman, whose powerful strength was almost a match for his own. "Here! Take him and I'll start the engine."

He forced him into my arms and leaped out again. The moment that he had left the automobile my antagonist disengaged himself with ease and blew a shrill, prolonged blast upon his whistle. A moment later I heard the thump of a policeman's nightstick upon the pavement, two or three blocks away.

The watchman's strength was more than mine. The only fortunate circumstance was that as yet he had not seen the broken pieces of the statue in the tonneau. In front, Nikolai was cranking furiously. The watchman called and shouts re-echoed from the street. Then the engine began to chug and Nikolai leaped in, just as the watchman gained the street.

A policeman had darted up and, as the wheels began to move, he grasped at my collar. I shook him off. We left him and the watchman behind. A moment later we were traversing the street at full speed and congratulating ourselves that we had shaken off our pursuers. We were premature. I heard a chug, chug, chug behind us. As I turned my head I saw the policeman leap upon the watchman's motorbicycle and shoot in our direction.

Now followed a pretty chase. The motor-bicycle was as swift as the automobile. Time and again the policeman caught us; but one turn of the wheel and our huger bulk turned in upon him dangerously, threatening to shake him from his perch. He whistled all the while. Crowds came pouring out of side streets. Once he drew his revolver, but a deft movement in his direction caused a slight collision, and, in saving himself, our pursuer lost his weapon. By now we were speeding through Boston's streets, the city streets, which were as light as day and filled with theater crowds. Soon we should be compelled to halt. Multitudes took up the chase. We turned off along the Common, shot across the grass, and sped along the deserted glades beneath the old trees; and all the while the policeman followed us, riding now behind, now at our sides. We could not shake him off.

Suddenly a desperate expedient occurred to me. I turned, and, groping among the fragments of the dismembered statue, I found the leg. I seized it by the ankle and, taking aim, flung it with all my might at our pursuer. It struck him squarely beneath the chin. He swerved and toppled from his machine, and went crashing with it upon the ground. Nikolai pulled the machine to a standstill, sprang out, and picked up our useful weapon. He brought it back broken into two parts but still serviceable. The policeman remained stunned upon the ground.

Then, speeding up the machine, we regained the streets, and a few moments after were leaving the city in our rear as we tore out toward the country.

We were safe. But, looking at the pieces of the statue, I wondered how Nikolai proposed to sell them to Essayan.

"I shall not sell them to Essayan; I shall sell them in London to his agent Berg," Nikolai explained to me on the following day, as we sat together in our Boston lodgings.

"But Berg is an art expert; you can't deceive Berg," I exclaimed. "Berg knows all the statues which he has purchased for Essayan. You can't sell him the same again."

"NOT A PENNY," ANSWERED ESSAYAN.

Nikolai laughed. "My dear Summers, perhaps I should have initiated you into the whole secret at the beginning," he said. "Well, I will do so now." And then he told me.

His story began with his arrival at the custom house. After what seemed an immeasurable period in the obscurity of his case he found himself lifted upon a cart and conveyed to Essayan's house. The banker had left a deputy in charge while he was away, a shrewd fellow who was instructed to admit nobody to the museum under any pretext at all. So well did he fulfill his instructions that he dismissed the carrier and, with the aid of the watchman, carried the supposed mummy into the museum, with much undoing of bolts and bars. He placed Nikolai and his coffin upon the ground in the mummy room and retired, chuckling over his shrewdness.

After waiting till evening, to assure himself that he would not be disturbed, Nikolai opened the case and emerged.

Cautiously he explored the chamber. He found that it opened into the house by means of an unlocked door. Clearly the banker did not apprehend attack from within; and for the safety of his house he trusted his watchman. Nikolai's first act was to discover the upper window from which he could get into touch with me. His second was to rearrange the contents of the mummy case, so that, when it was opened, the absence of any body would arouse suspicion of trickery on the dealer's part rather than suggest that it had been used as a medium for burglary. Having done this Nikolai entered the statue gallery.

"I had already formed my scheme, Summers," he said, "but what struck me at once was the very mutilated condition of Essayan's statues. Hardly a one but lacked some member of the body. And then I remembered Essayan's comment upon this fact, and how he had boasted that he did not know one from the other—knew only that he had paid out twelve million dollars for them.

"Now, this was my scheme. I did not intend to steal a statue. I planned to steal parts of several statues; to chop a leg from one that had two legs, an arm from one that had two arms; a torso from a statue that was otherwise complete; fingers and legs and ears and other members to make up my complete art object.

"Summers, my plan succeeded beyond expectation. I have robbed Essayan of an entire statue; yet so skillfully has it been done that the ignorant fool will never discover that he has lost anything."

To this the papers bore witness on the following day. I cull this extract from the Boston Record-Mirror.

"A daring robbery was attempted last night at the house of Mr. Essayan, the well-known banker. The thieves made their appearance in an automobile, and had almost succeeded in effecting an entrance when they were surprised by the night watchman. A desperate struggle followed, but the night watchman having foiled their attempt to kidnap him in their machine, succeeded in drawing his whistle and in warning the police. Officer Z270 gave chase upon his motor-cycle and followed the burglars as far as the Common, when he was struck by some missile and felled unconscious. The thieves succeeded in escaping and so far have not been traced, though it is thought that the identity of at least one of them is known to Mr. Essayan—who had, in fact, been led to expect just such an attempt. It is believed that Mr. Essayan's art gallery was the object of the attempt. However, a careful examination by Mr. Essayan revealed the fact that the gallery was never entered."

A month later Nikolai and I were in London, in the guise of art agents from the Levant. We interested Mr. Berg in our new statue.

"Dug up near Candia, Crete," said Nikolai, in broken English. "The mutilated condition is ascribed to the fact that the statue was demolished and buried by an earthquake about the time of Augustus."

"It has been pieced together creditably," said Berg, examining it with extraordinary interest. "A truly remarkable piece of work. I should say that it had been made experimentally by one versed in the various schools of the civilized world about the time of Christ. Other statues, for instance, show the influence of some special school, but this head seems to have been modeled after the school of Phidias; here we have one leg of contemporary Cretan sculpture and its fellow of Roman work. Possibly a composite, prepared by pupils in the local school. As a curiosity it should be of vast interest; but I am not prepared to offer an exorbitant amount. How much do you want for it?"

"Two hundred thousand dollars, American," Nikolai answered.

"Call it a hundred and fifty thousand and I'll purchase it," said Berg.

Nikolai agreed reluctantly.

"By the way," he continued, when Berg had signed in Essayan's name, "is that the Mr. Essayan who received the mysterious empty mummy case last month, as reported in the art papers? I think I have a clue to the sender. Tell him to look inside and find whether there is not something written in English upon a piece of papyrus."

MATTERS TO PONDER OVER

Some Timely Thoughts That Will Be Found Worth More or Less Consideration.

I like to talk about the "good old times" once in awhile, but I believe the new times are better. Compare the comforts of life and the facilities for carrying on farm work of the present day with those of 25 years ago and you will agree with me, I think. We are living in the best time and in the best country the world ever saw, but some of us have not yet found it out.

You can almost tell what kind of a farmer a man is by the rattle of his mowing machine. The best kept machinery makes the least noise.

Too many of us believe in co-operation of the kind that means: You help me and I'll help myself.

The man who can afford to dress his wife and daughter comfortably and well and does not is a sorry sort of a fellow.

God made woman's body the most beautiful thing on earth and he intended that it should be properly clothed and cared for.

Many a boy's heart has been hurt and his disposition soured by senseless and thoughtless criticism of his personal appearance and manners. The young heart is always sensitive to ridicule—the cruelest weapon that can be used—and it should never be directed against a boy or girl. Recollections of undeserved and thoughtless ridicule of dress, the result of poverty, 40 years ago, causes the blood to rush to our own faces to this day.—C. M. S.

Method of Trapping Eagles.

Every year thousands of Chinese go into Mongolia to catch eagles to use for fans. Tame eagles carried on their shoulders are used as decoys when certain spots are selected for the baiting of nests with Ken-yu or small fish. Other eagles then join the tame ones, and the nests are raised by the trappers

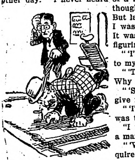
Makes a Living Buying Old Rugs From Dentists

NEW YORK.—"There is at least one man in New York who makes his living by buying worn-out rugs from dental offices," said a New York dentist the other day. "I never heard of a business of this nature until last month, although I have been in the dentistry for 20 years. But last month a friend of mine dropped in while I was examining the rug in my operating room. It was looking pretty shabby, I found, and I was figuring what kind of a new rug I'd get.



"'I'll have to throw this old rug away,' I said to my friend.

"'Throw it away? What will you do that for? Why don't you sell it?' he asked.

"'Sell it?' said I. 'There's no one who would give me anything for that worn-out old trash.'

"'I'll send you a man who'll buy it pretty quick,' was the reply.

"I thought my friend was joking, but next day a man arrived first thing in the morning.

"'Where's that rug you wanted to sell?' he inquired.

"I showed him. He pulled out a magnifying glass right away and got down on his hands and knees. He started at one corner of the rug and worked inch by inch over the whole surface, scrutinizing it with the most intense care.

"How much do you want for the rug?" he asked.

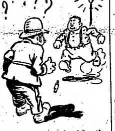
"I thought I would try a straight shot, without having any idea of the value, and so I said: 'Oh, $50, I should think.'

"To my surprise the rug trader did not express indignation. He merely said that was too high. We did some negotiating, and finally he gave me $33 and took the rug.

"I found later that this man does a good business by buying dilapidated rugs from dentists. He cuts the rugs into small squares and burns them in a machine, which catches the gold and platinum dust."

Patrolman James Kennedy Is Some Fast Runner

SAN FRANCISCO.—If Patrolman James Kennedy can run two given blocks in 15 seconds, how fast can Patrolman James McEachren negotiate the distance? If one must ask this question, he must be prepared to do some running himself, because of what happened in the Richmond not so long ago.



McEachren is an athlete, as his Portola records will evidence. That is why, the other night, when the policeman chanced to encounter some of his fellows at a certain corner, he was lured into a heated argument.

"This Jim Kennedy is some runner," was the sentence that greeted McEachren, as he joined the group. "He ran these two block in 15 seconds the other night, and I'll bet no one else can do it."

As was meant, McEachren took this as a tentative challenge. It took about three minutes for him to offer to demonstrate that Kennedy was no wonder, McEachren having figured the distance at about 120 yards. A stop watch was produced.

As McEachren disappeared in the darkness, the others were joined by the patrol sergeant of the section, who had slipped up unawares.

"Where's McEachren?" asked the sergeant.

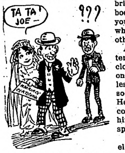
"He was here a minute ago," replied one of the group. "He walked up the block, but if you chip your whistle I think he will join you out."

The sergeant raised his whistle and blew a shrill blast. At the first sound there came out of the night a clattering noise resembling nothing the sergeant could imagine.

Even as the ranking officer prepared to voice his surprise there hove into sight a hatless, coatless figure that catapulted itself with the speed of an Arthur Duffy directly toward the sergeant. It was McEachren.

Blushing One Had Gone With a Handsomer Man

COLUMBUS, IND.—Joseph Walters is creaking around in the meanest pair of new shoes a man ever wore. Every now and again he bends over and looks into the depths of their patent leather sparkle and when he does large, briny tears trickle off his nose and spatter on the boots that lost a bride for him. And a charming young woman, who was Miss Mary Moore and who was to have been Mrs. Joseph Walters the other afternoon, is Mrs. Charles Hovis today.

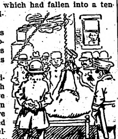


All arrangements had been made for Mr. Walters to marry Miss Moore. He put on a suit of clothes that looked as though it had been painted on, wore a late model collar that left him speechless and was all ready for the marriage when some one told him his shoes spoiled the picture. He told them that he only had 15 minutes and couldn't wait to buy any, but his friends told him to delay the wedding. So, away Mr. Walters sped for the shoes.

In the meantime, Charles Hovis, Walters' most eligible rival, stopped at Miss Moore's to say good-a-by forever. After a time it began to look as if he would have forever to say it. Finally Charley up and asked her. She said: "I will," and she did.

Derrick Hoists Horse Lying on Back in a Hole

DETROIT, MICH.—Thousands of persons the other afternoon gathered on Griswold street and clustered in the windows of adjoining office buildings as the police strove to rescue a blind horse which had fallen into a ten-foot areaway. Business was halted until the animal had been extricated.



For more than two hours the animal lay on its back at the bottom of the areaway while the police and volunteer rescuers pondered over ways and means of getting it out. The areaway is about 15 feet long, 5 feet wide and 10 feet deep.

The police found it impossible to use their tripod derrick, which is used to raise horses which have slipped on wet pavements, because there was no ledge in the adjacent building wall on which a pole could be rested. The police were puzzled how to proceed. A spectator suggested a moving van hoisting outfit. The animal welfare ambulance with ropes and tackle was also summoned. With all this apparatus on the scene the rescuers were still unable to hit on a feasible plan. Finally one of the officers expressed the opinion that the trick might be turned by running a stout beam out from a second story window of a building attaching hoisting tackle to it and obtained a hoisting engine to provide the lifting power. While the beam was being put in place an officer borrowed a hoisting engine from a construction job in the neighborhood. Two other officers descended into the areaway and at the risk of being injured by the frantic animal fastened ropes and chains around the horse. The engine was then started and the horse was slowly lifted from the hole.

AIMS BLOW AT LOBBYISTS

© HARRIS & EWING

Senator Lee Overman of North Carolina, chairman of the senate lobby investigating committee, will introduce a bill soon so drastic that it may be questioned whether under its provisions a headquarters or office can be maintained in Washington by any business organization interested in legislation. Not only will Senator Overman include features of the Massachusetts law requiring the registration of legislative counsel and agents, but he will incorporate the resolution of Andrew J. Peters of Massachusetts providing for the publication of a bulletin of committee hearings. This is a reform for which the press gallery and many members of house and senate have been working, but action has been delayed party through the recent refusal of congress to transact general business.

"The point is this," said the senator. "The public has a right to know when hearings will be held, that it may be properly represented. It has a right to know what class of men are trying to influence legislation in congress and why. It is not improper for any person to appear before a congressional committee in favor of or in opposition to a measure, but it is improper for lobbyists to come here in disguise."

IN LINE WITH TRADITION

When Hamilton Fish, Progressive, took seat in the New York assembly January 7, as representative from Putnam county, he was entering the legislature at twenty-four, the same age at which his father entered the assembly just 40 years ago from the same constituency.

In addition he is probably, by a considerable margin, the youngest member of the state lawmaking body, just as was his father when he entered the lower house.

And the comparison and coinsidence do not end there, for each has been a chairman of a political county committee in Putnam. The father for many years captained the Republican committee, and the son is now the head of the Progressives. The father is now a Progressive.

When Mr. Fish took up his lawmaking duties he was the third of the same name in direct line, and the latest in a long family history to serve state or Nation in one important capacity or another. That service, indeed, began 250 years ago. For Jonathan Fish, first of the family to settle in the United States, became a distinguished magistrate soon after removing from Massachusetts to Newtown Village in 1659.

Hence, in the minds of those who make a specialty of political history, and who believe in heredity, this youngest political figure in the annals of an old family may well be watched for future development.

FAVORED FOR HIGH POST

According to those high in the confidence of church circles in Rome, William Cardinal O'Connell, archbishop of Boston, was at one time seriously considered as the successor of the late Cardinal Rampolla, who was archpriest of St. Peters. An official bulletin a few days ago, however, announced the appointment of Cardinal Merry del Val to that high office.

Incidentally, the rumor of the possible appointment of the noted American prelate was received in Rome with the expression of warmest approval.

Regarding the then possible call to St. Peters, the impression prevailed in the Eternal City Catholic circles that the Boston cardinal could have had the post if he had so desired. Notwithstanding Cardinal Merry del Val's appointment, these same circles are inclined to believe that the future holds great honors for his eminence.

According to time-honored tradition, the office of archpriest of the greatest temple in Christendom is always reserved for the papal secretary of state. On the day following the election of a new pope he leaves the state chancery and takes his place among the administration cardinals, and according to this theory the office would eventually go to Cardinal Merry del Val.

MRS. WHITNEY'S DESIGN ACCEPTED

Plans for the Titanic memorial submitted by Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney of New York have been accepted by the Washington (D. C.) Fine Arts commission. The memorial is to be erected here to commemorate the heroism of the men who sacrificed their lives that the women passengers of the vessel might be saved.

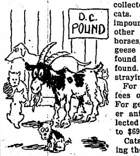
The announcement was made by Mrs. John Hays Hammond, secretary of the Titanic Memorial association, which has raised $43,000 for the erection of the memorial. She is also chairman of the committee that finally passed upon the designs.

Mrs. Robert Chew, chairman of the District of Columbia association, received a letter from Mrs. Hammond communicating to her the fact that the commission had approved the design submitted by Mrs. Whitney. Mrs. John Hay, president of the Titanic Memorial association, also announced that Mrs. Whitney's design had been accepted. Seven designs were submitted to the commission which, with Mrs. Hammond, made the selection. Some of the most prominent sculptors of the country were among the competitors.

WASHINGTON CITY SIDELIGHTS

One Goat and Thousands of Cats in the Pound

WASHINGTON.—Statistics as to stray domestic animals and their disposition by the District pound have come to light in the semi-annual report of that institution to the health department. For the greater part of the time of the collectors of the pound is taken up with dogs and cats. In the half year just closed there were impounded 2,423 cats and 2,176 dogs, while of other animals there were only six cows, two horses, and one goat. It is provided by law that geese also must be taken into custody when found at large, but in the last half-year none was found. Other animals required to be taken when straying are bulls, mules, calves, sheep and hogs.

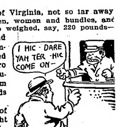


For the latter three classes of animals, pound fees of one dollar are charged for redemption. For geese the charge is 50 cents, and for all other animals except cats, two dollars. Fees collected for the half year just completed amounted to $692.

Cats are collected only on request of those having them in charge, and are taken to be painlessly killed. They are not even confined for a short period, but put immediately in the gas chamber, where they are asphyxiated. Officials in charge of the activities of the pound are beginning the use of traps for catching cats, but these, too, are placed on private property, and only on request. The traps are so constructed as to confine the cats in a ventilated box.

Stood Himself on Track and Did Ajax Act

A CAR was whizzing toward the green hills of Virginia, not so far away. The big suburban was crowded with men, women and bundles, and everybody was happy except one passenger who weighed, say, 220 pounds—and every pound a jag. He was a noisy man, and he wanted to fight. He was so set for a scrimmage that the motorman finally accommodated him by putting him off the car. Before the hero could get back to his car and start it Mr. Milwaukee was on the track daring him to run him down. The scheme worked, and the 220 pounds worth of jag reeled aboard again.



I HIC DARE YAH TER HIC COME ON—

The motorman with the valuable assistance of the conductor, put the jagman off the car eight distinct and dramatic times. And for eight distinct and dramatic times Mr. Milwaukee stood himself on the track and did the Ajax act, and—

Then a small, anemic man who had also been overzealous in his attempt to make Milwaukee famous, and who was the roisterer's companion, took a sudden virtuous zigzag notion to help out the motorman in his good work by sitting on his friend after he had been bounced from the car. You have heard about that rhythmic fly on the wheel of an automobile.

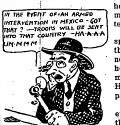
Well, sir, the two created such a rumpus that it attracted the attention of a passenger who had been reading his newspaper at the lower end of the car. He was as heavy a man as Milwaukee, and, what weighed more, he was as sober as that judge we do our comparing by. One look out of the window was all he needed to send him to the rescue.

"Hold on—that's my brother; I'll settle him."

And he did. You bet he did! The words were not out of his mouth before he had jumped into the scene of action, flung brother Milwaukee flat on his back and was sitting astride of him.

Doesn't Believe in Taking Things Too Seriously

THERE is one man in congress who doesn't believe in taking things too seriously. He is Representative Buck Howard of Georgia, a young man with a brilliant sense of humor. Unlike some of his co-workers in congress he doesn't try to placate newspaper men. He makes friends of them, but doesn't hesitate to tell tales about them.



IN THE EVENT OF AN ARMED INTERVENTION IN MEXICO—GOT THAT? —TROOPS WILL BE SENT INTO THAT COUNTRY —HA-A-A-A UN-M-M-M

"One day," said he recently, "a young correspondent was in my office. He had just visited the state department to get news and apparently no news had been forthcoming. So after a while he had come up to congress and had dropped into my place to telephone a line or so to his editors. He took off the receiver, got his office and prepared to dictate a story.

"'Take this,' he said. 'Ha-a-ah-ump—in the event of an armed intervention in Mexico—got that? In the event of an armed intervention in Mexico—ha-a-a-ah—u-m-m-m!'

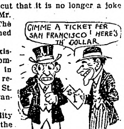
"There was a moment of painful silence. Then the man who was taking the illuminating article evidently began to protest against the delay.

"'In the event of an armed intervention in Mexico,' concluded the reporter, desperately, 'it is highly probable that troops will be sent into that country!'"

Representative Howard always wonders what the editor said when he read those lines.

It Is No Longer a Joke to This Congressman

"HEY, Reilly, gimme a ticket for San Francisco! Here's the dollar." So many members of the house of representatives have recently thrust this bit of wit upon the member from Connecticut that it is no longer a joke to him. It all came about through a bill that Mr. Reilly introduced in the house "by request." The request was made by a man in his district named James L. Cowles.



GIMME A TICKET FER SAN FRANCISCO! HERE'S TH' DOLLAR

Long before the parcel post was put into existence Mr. Cowles was advocating it, and so complete had the working of that system become, in his mind at least, that the amount of money required to carry a parcel from Chicago to St. Paul would carry it from New York to San Francisco.

So firm was Mr. Cowles' belief in the feasibility of his scheme that he extended it to apply to the railroads. He advocated a flat rate for freight and passenger transportation, and his flat rate was placed at $1. This would take a passenger from Washington to Alexandria, across the Potomac river, or from Washington to San Francisco.

"By request," Mr. Reilly introduced a bill in the house to help Mr. Cowles put his scheme into operation. That is as far as it has gone. And that is the reason so many members are thrusting $1 bills in Mr. Reilly's direction and asking him for tickets to San Francisco.

SEA COLLISION; 41 LOSE LIVES WHEN SHIP SINKS

OLD DOMINION LINER, MONROE, CUT IN TWO BY STEAMER NANTUCKET IN DENSE FOG.

SLEEPING PASSENGERS ARE PLUNGED TO DEATH

Darkness and Fog Delays Rescue Work and But Eighty-five Aboard Doomed Vessel Are Saved—Rescue Ship With Survivors in Port.

Norfolk, Va., Feb. 2.—The story of how 41 persons went down to death in the still waters of the Atlantic when the liner Nantucket rammed and sank the steamer Monroe was brought to port by the survivors of the sunken ship's company, who were rescued and brought to shore by the Nantucket.

Death Was Sudden.

It was a story of sudden death, sweeping out of the dark and fog and taking unawares the doomed half hundred with the heaviness of sleep still upon them. It told how the stricken Monroe, with her side gored deep by the knifelike steel prow of the Nantucket, filled rapidly, rolled over on her side and in a few minutes turned completely over and plunged to the bottom, carrying with her the ill-fated passengers and members of the crew who had failed to get clear of the wreck.

The revised lists prepared by Captain Johnson, who survived the sunken vessel, showed:

Lost—Passengers, 19; crew, 22: total, 41.

Saved—Passengers, 39; crew, 60; total, 99.

Lost: Passengers, 25; crew, 24; total, 49. Saved: Passengers, 30; crew, 55; total, 85.

Ship Cut in Two.

The Monroe was rammed amid-ships, practically cut in two, and sunk within ten minutes, twenty miles southeast of Hog Island, by the Nantucket at 2 a. m.

Captain Johnson, of the sunken Monroe, and all his officers but one were saved. The lost officer was Second Officer Gately.

Had Night Clothes On.

None of the passengers who were saved had anything with them except their night clothing they wore when the steamer went down.

James O'Connell of Washington, one of the survivors, was saved in his underclothing. As soon as he could get down the gangplank he rushed to a telephone to tell his wife in Washington of his safety.

Sinks Like a Plummet.

The Monroe, its passengers pitched out of berths in night clothes, sank like a plummet.

In the swirling vortex of the sinking ship men shouted and women screamed through the mist. The Monroe went down so quickly that there was little time for launching boats and it is believed that the only refugees were those saved at once by the Nantucket.

The lost had scarcely a chance to realize that death was upon them before they were struggling in the sea. The doomed passengers of the Monroe, fast asleep in their cabins when the two vessels came together, went down to death with only time for a shriek of despair.

Only those kept awake by the snorting sirens, that wailed their useless warnings through the fog, knew when the vessels struck.

Orders Out Lifeboats.

As the Nantucket staggered back after the shock Chaptain Perry swung out his searchlight and dimly the bulk of the settling Monroe loomed up through the drifting fog.

Uncertain as to the fate of his own vessel, he ordered out the lifeboats. Lost form view in the fog they began the work of rescue. Guided only by the shrieks of the drowning, the boats picked up the survivors.

Property Loss $1,000,000.

The steamer was valued at approximately $500,000 and its cargo as much more, making the total loss, exclusive of lives, about $1,000,000.

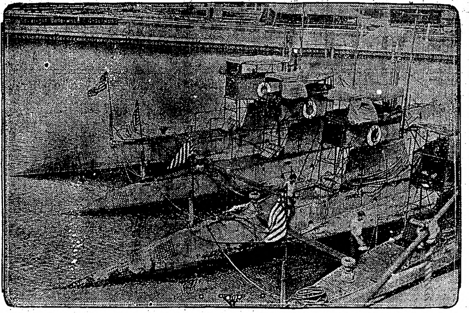
Tower of Siloam Located.

Cambridge, Mass., Feb. 2.—News o. the finding of the foundations of the Tower of Siloam has been received by Rev. Dr. Kellar of the Episcopal Theological school from a friend from Jerusalem. This tower is mentioned in Luke XIII, 4: "Those 18 upon whom the tower in Siolam fell and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem?"

More Marines in Haiti.

Washington, Feb. 2.—All the marines from the United States battleship South Carolina have been landed at Port Au Prince from the cruiser Montana, guarding interests here. Captain Russell's dispatch to the navy department said several candidates for the Haitian presidency were preparing to march on Port Au Prince today. Officials say there has been no further disorders, but the men were landed as a precaution.

SUBMARINES AT COLON FOR DEFENSE OF CANAL



Four of the five submarines which, accompanied by a collier and the monitor Montauk, made the record-breaking voyage from Guantanamo, Cuba, to Colon, Panama, where they are now anchored at the new concrete docks, waiting to pass through the canal. They will be used in the defense of the Pacific entrance to the canal. This is the first time that submarines have made such a long sea voyage.

BOAT OFFICIALS' STATEMENT

TELLS HOW SINKING OF MONROE WAS INEVITABLE.

Nantucket Did Not Reply to Last Two Whistles, Is the Charge of General Manager.

Norfolk, Va., Feb. 2.—The following statement concerning the sinking of the Monroe was given out by Assistant General Manager E. E. Palen of the Old Dominion Steamship company:

"The Monroe left Norfolk at 7:40 and ran into a light fog when outside of the capes, and was proceeding cautiously on her route to New York, blowing a fog whistle every minute by an automatic time clock. She passed two vessels, stopping in each case when she heard their signals.

"When about half way between Cape Charles lightship and the Winter Quarter lightship, she heard the fog whistle of the Nantucket off her starboard bow. She stopped and blew two whistles, which were responded to by the Nantucket. She again blew two whistles, which were not responded to, and immediately thereafter the crash came.

"The Nantucket was not visible except immediately before the collision, the fog being heavy near the water, but light above.

"The Monroe was struck on the starboard side one-third the distance from her bow, the Nantucket penetrating the Monroe something like one-third of her width, making the sinking of the Monroe inevitable.

"Captain Johnson, who had been in the pilot house for several hours, immediately gave notice to the steward to awaken all the passengers, though the passengers were at that time rushing out of their staterooms.

"They were told to come at once to the boat deck. The dynamo, which was then running, gave out in a few minutes and the vessel was encompassed in darkness until Engineer Oscar Perkins went below and started the second dynamo, which ran for two or three minutes. The Monroe immediately listed to the starboard and in the course of three or four minutes the starboard side of the Monroe was awash, and the port side was high in the air. In the collision, boat No. 1, on the starboard side, was crushed; boat No. 3, on the starboard side, fell in the water and was swamped; boat No. 5 was sent off under the supervision of Captain Johnson, and boat No. 7 was gotten off under the supervision of First Officer Horsley. It was impossible to use boats 2, 4, 6 and 8, as they were on the port side, and could not be put out on account of the list of the vessel to starboard.

"The life rafts on the forward deck of the vessel floated as the boat sank, and were instrumental in saving many lives.

"Captain Johnson's orders, immediately after discovering the vessel was doomed, were that women and children should come first and this order was repeated by the other officers and strictly obeyed. There was no panic at any time, nor was there any failure to take anybody on board the life boats who could be found.

"The passengers speak in the highest terms of the gallantry of the officers and crew, and many of them praise the coolness of the negroes."

Ransom Letter May Be Hoax.

Los Angeles, Feb. 2.—H. C. Serbe, chauffeur for F. Lewis Clark, the Spokane millionaire, who disappeared at Santa Barbara two weeks ago, looked at the letter demanding $75,000, said to have been written by kidnapers of Clark. He expressed the belief it was a hoax. Chief of Police Sebastian published a notice demanding that the authors of the letter send some statement from Clark that would establish to his relatives that he was alive.

APPROVE TREATIES WITH ALL POWERS

PRINCIPAL COUNTRIES OF WORLD INCLUDED IN PENDING PACTS.

REHABILITATES ARBITRATION

Expected Treaties Will Be Passed on Favorably Soon—Follows President Wilson's Suggestion.

Washington, Feb. 2. — Responding promptly to President Wilson's appeal, made at the White House conference last Monday night, the senate committee on foreign relations has ordered favorable reports on a large number of arbitration treaties between the United States and the leading countries of the world. These were laid before the senate later in executive session and will come up for ratification in the near future.

As to Action.

This action will rehabilitate that extensive structure of arbitration which had been gradually falling to pieces by the expiration of the time limit of one treaty after another until all of them had either expired or were about to expire.

While the treaties are yet to be ratified, the favorable action of the committee and the strong incentive given by the president's appeal, promises to lead to early and favorable action on most, if not all, of them.

The far reaching character of this group of treaties is shown by the long list of first-rate powers with which they are made, including most of the great powers of Europe, South America, and the Orient. On the list are Great Britain, Japan, Italy, Spain, Norway, Sweden, Portugal, Switzerland and France, the pact with the latter having been ratified last February.

Treaties Expiring.

Similar treaties which will expire within a year of two exist with The Netherlands, Denmark, China, Austria-Hungary, Peru, Salvador, Costa Rica, Paraguay, Haiti, Ecuador, Brazil and Uruguay.

SENTIMENT IS NOW IMPROVED

Optimistic Spirit Causes Favorable Developments of Past Week.

New York, Feb. 2.—Bradstreet's says:

"Most developments of the week are favorable, though it is evident that improved sentiment rather than actual expansion of demand is the basis for many cheerful reports. Following the exhibition of exigent buying to replenish broken stocks, there has come in many lines a cautious, almost slow enlargement of operations which mark the continuance of the conservatism that has characterized trade for several years past. There is, however, no apparent diminution of the tone of optimism which bids fair to find expression in more active buying when the full effects of the ease in monetary affairs filters down and influences the usual spring season of industrial and commercial expansion."

Actors Who Perished Friday.

New York, Jan. 31. — The Macaria Theatrical company, six of whose members perished in the Monroe disaster, was sent out by William Woods, now in Boston as manager of the Boston theater. The play was a dramatization of a novel of the southern confederacy by Augusta Evans. The dramatist was Charles M. Jelleff of Baltimore, who was among those who met death. The Miss Haviland in the list of dead was Miss Hilda Haviland, leading lady of the production, a New York girl.

350 SUFFRAGISTS MAKE PLEA

WOMEN OF TEN STATES CALL ON PRESIDENT WILSON.

Sought to Induce Executive to Take Stand in Favor of Their Movement—Working Women.

Washington, Feb. 3.—Three hundred and fifty working women, representing ten states, called on President Wilson today to ask his support for the national woman suffrage movement.

The women appealed for the creation of a house committee on suffrage, and also tried to induce the president to take a personal stand upon the question.

The women in the delegation came from factory, mill, shop and office. The spokeswomen were Miss Marguerite Hinchy, a laundry worker of New York, and Miss Winslow, a Pennsylvania weaver.

Receptions for the visitors were given at hotels and the residences of local suffragists. Senator LaFollette, Representative McDonald of Michigan, and Representative Keating of Colorade, cheered the hopes of the women with predictions of universal suffrage in the near future.

The delegations held a mass meeting this morning, after which, at 12:15 o'clock, they "Fell in" and marched to the White House.

The states represented by the delegations are Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, West Virginia, Maryland and Rhode Island.

The District of Columbia also was represented.

CHARGES AGAINST GOMPERS

Was Intoxicated, Insists Labor Leader, on Other Occasions—Wild Disorder.

Indianapolis, Feb. 2.—Scenes of the wildest disorder marked the convention of the United Mine Workers of America, which heard Duncan McDonald, secretary-treasurer of the Illinois miners, declare that Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, was "gloriously drunk" during the Seattle convention and on other occasions; Gompers' denial, and the reiteration by Charles H. Moyers, president of the Western Federation of Miners, that if the copper strike in Michigan were to fail, it would be due to the lack of financial assistance given by the American Federation of Labor.

The delegates showed little sympathy for Gompers and he declared he was being "tried before a jury whose minds were already poisoned," but every point made by Moyer and McDonald was wildly applauded. After McDonald had concluded, the tumult was so great that Gompers, despairing of a hearing, put on his overcoat and hat and started to leave. The delegates were silenced, however, by an appeal from Moyer, and Gompers returned.

Interstate Commerce Commissioners.

Washington, Feb. 2.—President Wilson has nominated these interstate commerce commissioners: Winthrop More Daniels, of Princeton, N. J.; Henry Clay Hall, of Colorado Springs, Col. Collector of customs for the district of Iowa: Christian A. Niemeyer, of Creston, Iowa.

Twenty-four Treaties Ratified.

Washington, Jan. 31. — The senate foreign relations committee vote to recommend immediate ratification of general arbitration treaties with Great Britain, Japan and other nations, twenty-four treaties in all. These have been pending since last summer, when their original five-year limitations expired. The vote in favor of the treaties was 11 to 2, with four senators absent. Senators O'Gorman (dem.), New York, and William Alden Smith (rep.) of Michigan, voted in the negative.

PANAMA EXPOSITION HEADS ARRANGE FOR AERO CONTEST.

$300,000 OFFERED IN PRIZES

Any Sort of Air Craft May Be Entered—Long Jumps as High as 670 Miles Are Greatest Obstacles to Be Surmounted.

San Francisco, Feb. 3.—Three hundred thousand dollars, and perhaps more, will be offered in prizes to aeronauts who race around the world in any type of motor-driven air craft under the auspices of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition company.

Climax of Activities.

The race, the climax of the world's aeronautical activities, is to start early in May, 1915. Contestants will be allowed 90 days in which to make the flight of approximately 22,000 miles around the globe. The race starts and finishes on the grounds of the Panama Pacific exposition and the course lies east from San Francisco.

The route as now outlined crosses the Atlantic ocean, England, France, Germany, Russia, Japan, and the Pacific ocean.

The Atlantic ocean is conceded to be the most formidable stretch in the race. It will be essayed from Belle Isle, a small point between Newfoundland and Labrador.

Cape Farewell, Greenland, the next stop, barring a drop into the water, is 610 miles away and from Cape Farewell to Peyjavik, Iceland, is 670 miles further. One more jump to Stornaway, in the Hebrides, is 570 miles—and the Atlantic has been crossed.

No Distance Impossible.

That none of these three distances is impossible, aero experts assert, is shown by a recent flight of Garros, the French aviator, who did 600 miles over the Mediterranean from Cannes, France, to Tunis, Africa.

From the Hebrides to Edinburg, London, Paris, Berlin, Warsaw, St. Petersburg, Moscow and along the Trans-Siberian railway down into Manchuria and Korea, and across into Japan, runs the line of flight.

From northern Japan to Kamchatka, with varying routes across the little gap which separates Asia from North America, no obstacle likely to be met is insurmountable, it is declared. Vancouver, B. C., Seattle and Tacoma, Portland, Ore., and San Francisco again—and the world is belted.

No Craft Restrictions.

Monoplanes, biplanes, dirigibles, flying boats of any sort, are welcome in the race. The work of organization will fall to Arnold Kruckman, whose appointment as the manager of bureau of aeronautic of the exposition is announced.

"The flight around the world in 90 days is practicable today," said Mr. Kruckman. "A year from now, when advances will have been made in the structure of air craft, it will be twice as simple."

Race Made a Certainty.

New York.—The aeroplane race around the world, for prizes aggregating $300,000 was made practically a certainty when the Aero Club of America announced that it had promised its co-operation in plans for such an event.

The Panama-Pacific Exposition grounds in San Francisco will be the starting point of the race, and the conditions require contestants to finish at the same point within 90 days. The race will be started in 1915.

"The telegrams state," says the club's announcement, "that the exposition offers $150,000 in money prizes and expects to obtain at least $150,000 more, which will be divided among the contestants, the first prize to be $100,000."

CHURCH RITES ARE DISTURBED

Aroused by the Bishop's Stand Regarding Forcible Feeding of Suffragettes.

London, Feb. 3.—Aroused by the bishop of London's letter declaring "there is no truth in the allegations that the suffragettes in Holloway jail are subjected to torture while being forcibly fed," suffragettes repeatedly interrupted the consecration services conducted by him at St. Michael's church.

The women set up a chant, in which reference was made to forcible feeding, and they called upon the bishop to put a stop to "the torture of women in English prisons."

The disturbers were quickly removed. An attempt was made by the women to reach the bishop as he left the church but was frustrated by the police, who were present in force in anticipation of trouble.

Guests in New York Hotel Rescued.

New York, Feb. 3.—Twenty guests in the Hotel Lyric, facing Times Square, at Forty-third street, were trapped in their rooms by a fire which started in a cafe kitchen in the basement, and were rescued with ladders thrown against the side of the building and across roofs. Max Kennedy, the manager, was seriously burned and is expected to die. While on the third floor he had apparently lost his sense of direction, when the firemen rescued him.

"CASCARETS" FOR SLUGGISH LIVER

No sick headache, sour stomach, biliousness or constipation by morning.

Get a 10-cent box now.

Turn the rascals out—the headache, biliousness, indigestion, the sick, sour stomach and foul gases—turn them out to-night and keep them out with Cascarets.

Millions of men and women take a Cascaret now and then and never know the misery caused by a lazy liver, clogged bowels or an upset stomach.

Don't put in another day of distress. Let Cascarets cleanse your stomach; remove the sour, fermenting food; take the excess bile from your liver and carry out all the constipated waste matter and poison in the bowels. Then you will feel great.

A Cascaret to-night straightens you out by morning. They work while you sleep. A 10-cent box from any drug store means a clear head, sweet stomach and clean, healthy liver and bowel action for months. Children love Cascarets because they never gripe or sicken. Adv.

SAFE TO GO TO FUNERAL

Diplomatic Reasoning That Should Have Reassured the Ambassador in a Dilemma.

At the death of the duke of Wellington the whole diplomatic corps in London was invited to the funeral at St. Paul's. The French ambassador, on receiving his invitation, was very much upset. He hurried off to his colleague of Russia, Baron Brunow, and confided to him the difficulty in which he was placed.

"The queen," he said, "expects us to go to St. Paul's to the funeral of the duke of Wellington. How can I go, considering the injuries which the duke inflicted on my country? What shall I do?"

Baron Brunow listened gravely to his colleague's exposition, and then replied:

"As the duke is dead," he said. "I think you can safely go to the funeral. If you were asked to attend his resurrection, I should say refuse the invitation."

JUDGE CURED, HEART TROUBLE.

I took about 6 boxes of Dodds Kidney Pills for Heart Trouble from which I had suffered for 5 years. I had dizzy spells, my eyes puffed, my breath was short and I had chills and backache. I took the pills about a year ago and have had no return of the palpitations. Am now 63 years old, able to do lots of manual labor, am well and hearty and weigh about 200 pounds. I feel very grateful that I found Dodds Kidney Pills and you may publish this letter if you wish. I am serving my third term as Probate Judge of Gray Co. Yours truly,

Not Altogether Lost.

In the Shakespearean days actors were classed as rogues and outlaws. Will West, the portly comedian of "The Doll Girl," thinks that player folk are bad enough, but not as black as they are painted. He tells this story on Dick Burge, the English pugilist and actor, who was indicted in connection with the $500,000 Liverpool bank robbery.

Burge was on the witness stand.

"I understand," said the judge, "that you are an actor."

Burge blushed, swallowed convulsively and hesitated.

"No, you honor," he stammered; "only a thief."

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal New figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The general offers Francois a home at the Chateau. The boy refuses to leave his parents, but in the end becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis' son while the former goes to America. The Marquis before leaving for America asked Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her lackeys. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill, in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis's brother Francois lures the Austrians from the hotel allowing the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants.

CHAPTER XIV.—Continued.

A person of more importance than Battista had fallen under the spell of Francois' personality. The governor himself had been attracted by the young Frenchman. The governor, Count von Gersdorf, was a vain, discontented, brilliant Austrian, at odds with the world because he had not risen further in it. He was without society in this mountain fortress of his, and longed for it; he had a fine voice and no one to sing to; he liked to talk and had no one to talk to. Francois, with his ready friendliness, with his gift of finding good in every one, with his winning manner and simplicity which had the ease of sophistication, was a treasure-trove of amusement to the bored Austrian.

Things stood so with the prisoner at the time of his discovery of the identity of his jailer and of his jail. The governor at that time was away on a visit to Vienna, looking for a promotion; he came back elated and good-humored in the prospect of a change within the year. But the heart of Francois sank as he thought what the change might mean to him.

"Some day a marshal of France under another Bonaparte," he said to himself one day, staring through the bars at his window—he called the sky so. He smiled. "But that is nothing. To help place my prince on the throne of France—that is my work—my life."

He talked aloud at times, as prisoners come to do. He went on then, in a low voice.

"If there were good fairies, if I had three wishes: Alixe—the prince made emperor—Francois Beaupre, a marshal of France." He laughed happily. "It is child's play. Nothing matters except that my life shall do its work. Even that is so small; but I have a great desire to do that. I believe I shall do that—I know it." And he fell to work on a book which he was planning, chapter by chapter, in his brain.

But, if he were to escape ever, the chance was increased infinitely by the going back and forth to the governor's room. A new governor might keep him shut up absolutely. It had been so while the count was away; then he had been ill, and the lieutenant in command would not let a doctor see him till he became delirious; that was the ordinary treatment of prisoners. Francois, thinking over these things on a day, fell with a sudden accent on the steady push of his longing for freedom, the conviction that he must get free before the count left, else opportunity and force for the effort would both be gone forever. And on that day Battista brought in his midday meal with a look and a manner which Francois remarked.

"What is it, Battista?" he asked softly.

The man answered not a word, but turned and opened the door rapidly and looked out. "I thought I had left the water-pitcher. Ah, here it is—I am stupid," he spoke aloud. And then, finger on lip dramatically, he bent over the young man. "My son—the little Battista—has had a letter. The young master wishes him to come to him in France, to serve him. He is going in two days."

It was whispered quickly, and Battista stood erect.

"The signor's food will get cold if the signor does not eat it," he spoke gruffly. "I do not like to carry good food for prisoners who do not appreciate it. I shall bring less tomorrow."

But Francois, hardly hearing the surly tones, had his hand on Battista's arm, was whispering back eagerly.

"Where does he go, in France?"

"To Vicques," the low answer came. Francois sank back, tortured.

Going to Vicques, the little Battista! From Castleforte! And he, Francois, must stay here in prison! His soul was wrung with a sudden wild homesickness. He wanted to see Alixe, to see his mother, to see the general; to see the peaceful little village and the stream that ran through it, and the steep-arched bridge, and the poppy fields, and the corn! The gray castle with its red roofs, and the beech wood, and the dim, high-walled library, how he wanted to see it all! How his heart ached, madly, fiercely! This was the worst moment of all his captivity. And with that, Battista was over him, was murmuring words again. Something was slipped under the bedclothes.

"Paper—pens. The signor will write a letter this afternoon. And tomorrow little Battista will take it."

And the heart of Francois gave a sudden throb of joy as wild as its anguish. He could speak to them before he died; it might be they could save him. His hands stole to the package under the coarse blanket. It seemed as if in touching it he touched his mother and his sweetheart and his home.

CHAPTER XV.

Good News.

In the garden of the chauteau of Vicques, where the stiff, gray stone vases spilled again their heart's blood of scarlet and etching of vines; where the two stately lines of them led down to the sundial and the round lawn—on one of the griffin-supported stone seats Alixe and Pietro sat, where Alixe and Francois had sat five years before.

As they sat in the garden, they had been going over the pros and cons of his life or death for the thousandth time. Pietro's quiet gray eyes were sad as he looked away from Alixe and across the lawn to the beech wood.

"God knows I would give my life quickly if I could see him coming through the trees there, as we used to see him, mornings long ago, in his patched homespun clothes."

Alixe followed the glance consideringly, as if calling up the little, brown, trudging figure so well remembered. Then she tossed up her head sharply —"Who?"—and then she laughed. "I shall be seeing visions next, like Francois," she said. "I thought it was he —back in the beech wood."

"I see no one." Pietro stared.

"But you have no eyes, Pietro—I can always see a thing two minutes before you," Alixe threw at him. "There—the man."

"Oh," said Pietro. "Your eyes are more than natural, Alixe. You see into a wood; that is uncanny. Yes, I see him now. Mon dieu! he is a big fellow."

"A peasant—from some other village," Alixe spoke carelessly. "I do not know him," and they went on talking, as they had been doing, of Francois.

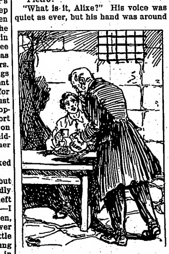
And with that, here was Jean Phillippe Moison, forty now and fat, but still beautiful in purple millinery, advancing down the stone steps between the tall gray vases, making a symphony of color with the rich red of the flowers. He held a silver tray; a letter was on it.

"For mademoiselle."

Mademoiselle took it calmly and glanced at it, and with that both the footman and the Marquis Zappi were astonished to see her fall to shivering, as if in a sudden illness. She caught Pietro's arm. The letter was clutched in her other hand thrust back of her.

"Pietro!"

"What is it, Alixe?" His voice was quiet as ever, but his hand was around her shaking fingers, and he held them strongly. "What is it, Alixe?"



It Was Whispered Quickly.

She drew forward the other hand; the letter shook, rustled with her trembling. "It is—from Francois!"

Jean Phillippe Moison having stayed to listen, as he ought not, lifted his eyes and his hands to heaven and gave thanks in a general way, volubly, unrebuked. By now the unsteady fingers of Alixe had opened the paper, and her head and Pietro's were bent over it, devouring the well-known writing. Alixe, excited, French, exploded into a disjointed running comment.

"From prison—our Francois—dear Francois!" And then: "Five years, Pietro! Think—while we have been free!" And then, with a swift clutch again at the big coat sleeve crowding against her: "Pietro! See, see! The date—it is only two months ago. He was alive then; he must be alive now; he is! I knew it, Pietro! A woman knows more things than a man."

With that she threw up her head and fixed Jean Phillippe, drinking in all this, with an unexpected stern glance. "What are you doing here, Moison? What manners are these?" Then, relapsing in a flash into pure human trust and affection toward the anxious old servant: "My dear, old, good Moison—he is alive—Monsieur Francois is alive—in a horrible prison in Italy! But he is alive, Moison!" And with that, a sudden jump again into dignity. "Who brought this, Moison?"

Jean Phillippe was only too happy to have a hand in the joyful excitement. "Mademoiselle, the young person speaks little language. But he told me to say to monsieur the marquis that he was the little Battista."

Pietro looked up quickly. "Alixe, it is the servant from my old home of whom I spoke to you. I can not imagine how Francois got hold of him, but he chose a good messenger. May I have him brought here? He must have something to tell us."

Alixe, her letter in her hands, struggled in her mind. Then: "The letter will keep—yes, let him come, and we can read it all the better after for what he may tell us."

So Moison, having orders to produce at once the said little Battista, retired, much excited, and returned shortly—but not so shortly as to have omitted a fling of the great news into the midst of the servants' hall. He conducted, marching behind him, the little Battista, an enormous young man of six feet four, erect, grave, stately. This dignified person, saluting the lady with a deep bow, dropped on one knee before his master, his eyes full of a worshiping joy, and kissed his hand. Having done which, he arose silently and stood waiting, with those beaming eyes feasting on Pietro's face, but otherwise decorous.

First the young marquis said some friendly words of his great pleasure in seeing his old servant and the friend of his childhood, and the big man stood with downcast eyes, with the color flushing his happy face. Then, "Battista," asked the marquis, "how did you get the letter which you brought mademoiselle?"

"My father," answered Battista laconically.

"How did your father get it?"

"From the signor prisoner, my signor."

Alixe and Pietro looked at him attentively, not comprehending by what means this was possible. Pietro, remembering the little Battista of old, vaguely remembered that he was incapable of initiative in speech. One must pump him painfully.

"Was your father in the prison where the signor is confined?" Alixe asked.

The little Battista turned his eyes on her a second, approvingly, but briefly. They went back without delay to their affair of devouring the face of his master. But he answered promptly. "Yes, signorina; he is there always."

"Always?" Pietro demanded in alarm. "Is Battista a prisoner?"

"But no, my signor."

"What then? Battista, try to tell us."

So adjured, little Battista made a violent effort. "He is one of the jailers, my signor."

"Jailers? For the Austrians?" The face of the marquis took all the joyful light out of the face of little Battista.

"My signor," he stammered, "it could not be helped. He was there. He knew the castle. They forced him at first, and—and it came to be so."

"Knew the castle!" Pietro repeated. "What castle?"

Battista's eyes turned to his Master's like those of a faithful dog, trusting but not understanding. "What castle, my signor? Castelforte—the signor's own castle—what other?"

A sharp exclamation from Alixe summed up everything. "Your castle is confiscated; they use it as a prison. Francois is a prisoner there, Pietro! All these years—in your own home!"

"I never dreamed of that," Pietro spoke, thinking aloud. "Every other prison in Austria and Italy I have tried to find him in. I never dreamed of Castelforte."

At the end of the interview the little Battista put his hand into his breast pocket and brought out another letter, thickly folded. Would mademoiselle have him instructed where to find the mother of the signor prisoner? He had promised to put this into her own hands. He must do it before he touched food.

And Jean Phillippe Moison, who had lurked discreetly back of the nearest stone vase, not missing a syllable, was given orders, and the huge little Battista was sent off up the stone steps between the scarlet flowers, up the velvet slope of lawn, in charge of the purple one.

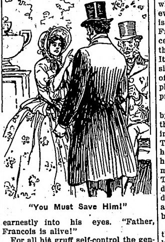
Half an hour later the general walked up from the village, walked slowly, thoughtfully through the beech wood, his face hardly older than when he had come to Vicques, but sterner and sadder; his still soldiery gait less buoyant than it had been five years ago.

He saw Alixe and Pietro coming joyfully toward him, running lightheartedly, calling to him with excited gay voices. It stabbed the general's heart; a quick thought came of that other who had been always with them, now dead or worse, of that other whom these two had forgotten. And with that they were upon him, and Alixe was kissing him, hugging him, pushing a letter into his hand, up his sleeve, into his face—anywhere.

"Father—good news—the best news —almost the best! Father, be ready for the good news!"

"I am ready," the general growled impatiently. "What is this foolery? Sabre de bois! What is your news, then, you silly child?"

And Alixe, shaking very much, laid her hand on his cheek and looked earnestly into his eyes. "Father, Francois is alive!"



"You Must Save Him!"

For all his gruff self-control the general made the letter an excuse shortly to sit down. Queer, that a man's knees should suddenly bend and give way because of a thrill of rapture in a man's psychological make-up! But the general had to sit down. And then and there all that had been extracted from little Battista was rehearsed, and the letter read over from start to finish.

"But he is alive, father! Alive! That is happiness enough to kill one. I never knew till now that I feared he was dead."

"Alive—yes! But in prison—in that devil's hole of an old castle!" And Alixe looked at Pietro and laughed, but the general paid no attention. "He must be got out. There is no time to waste. Diable! He is perishing in that vile stable! What was that the lad said about the doctor's speech, that only a long sea voyage could save him? One must get him out, mon dieu, quick!"

Alixe, her hand on his arm, put her head down on it suddenly and stood so for a moment, her face hidden. Pietro, his hands thrust deep in his pockets, looked at the general with wide gray eyes, considering. With that Alixe flashed up, turned on the young Italian, shaking her forefinger at him; her eyes shone blue fire.

"That is for you, Pietro. If we should lose him now, just as we have found him! Now is the time for you to show if you can be what is brave and strong, as Francois has shown. It is your castle; you must save him."

Pietro looked at the girl, and the color crept through his cheeks, but he said nothing.

"Alixe, my Alixe," her father put an arm around her. "One may not demand heroism as if it were bread and butter. Pietro will not fail us."

"Alixe always wished me to be brilliant like Francois," Pietro spoke gently. "But I never could."

"Yet, Pietro, it is indeed your time," Alixe threw at him eagerly. "Francois must be rescued or he will die."

"Yes," Pietro answered quietly. "Francois must be rescued."

He was silent a moment, as if thinking. His calm poised mind was working swiftly; one saw the inner action in the clear gray eyes. The general and Alixe, watching him, saw it.

"I think I know how," he said.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Stone Staircase.

Battista's prisoner stood at the barred window high up the steep side of the castle and stared out wistfully at the receding infinity of blueness—his meadow. In the three months since his letter had gone to France, he had grown old. The juices of his youth seemed dried up; his eyes were bloodshot, his skin yellow; there was no flesh on him. The waiting and hoping had worn on him more than the dead level of the hopeless years before. There was a new tenseness in the lightly-built figure, even in the long, delicate, strong fingers. The prisoner had caught a whiff of the air of home and was choking for a full breath.

"You are not well, my friend," said the governor. "The doctor must see you."

But Francois refused lightly and laughed and fell to singing an old peasant song of France which he had remembered lately; he got up on the table and droned it to an imaginary fiddle which he pretended to play after the manner of old Jacques Arne, who played for dances in Vicques. And the governor was taken with a violent fancy for it. He roared at it, and sang it over in fragments till he had learned it, and then he sang it and roared again and slapped his knee; there was a droll comedy in Francois' rendering also, not to be explained—and the count said that Francois must come to his rooms the next night for dinner and sing him the song again and also listen to a new one of his own.

So Francois was taken down the stone staircase and conducted to the two rooms which were the governor's suite. He knew them well, for he had dined many times with the count. But tonight he was left alone a few moments in the outer room, the living-room, while the governor was in the bedroom, and he looked about keenly with a strained attention which grew out of the suppressed hope of escape. Who knew what bit of knowledge of the castle might be vital, and who knew how soon? He noted the swords and pistols hanging on the wall, and marked a light saber whose scabbard was brightly polished as if the blade also were kept in good order. On the table he saw the flint and steel with which Count von Gersdorf lighted his pipe; he stepped to the window and bent out, scanning the wall. A stone coping, wide enough for a man's foot, but little more, ran, four feet below; ten feet beyond the window it ended in the roof of a shed, a sloping roof where a man could drop down, yes, or even climb up with ease. A man, that is, who had climbed when a boy as Francois had climbed—like a cat for certainty and lightness. But what then, when one was in the courtyard? It was walled about with a stone wall sixteen feet high; these old ancestors of Pietro, who had built this place, had planned well to keep Pietro's friend in prison.

So Francois, not hopeful of a sortie by that point, drew in his head from the open window and took to examining the walls of the governor's room. There were three doors—one from the hall by which he had come, one behind which he now heard the count moving in his bedroom, and a third. The count had gone through this last door one night a month before, into a dark, winding, stone staircase, and disappeared for three minutes, and brought up a bottle of wonderful wine.

"A fine stock they put down there—the Italians who ruled here for eight hundred-odd years," he had said. "I've lowered it a bit. A good spacious wine-cellar and grand old wine. You will be the better for a little." And Francois had watched him as he put the brass key back on the chain which hung from his belt.

At this point of memory the bedroom door opened, and the governor came out, in great good humor and ready to eat and drink as became an Austrian soldier. The dinner was brought in, but Francois, for all his efforts to do his part, could not swallow food, or very little. The fever, the unrest burning in him, made it impossible. Count Gersdorf looked at him seriously when dinner was over; as yet Francois, talking, laughing, singing, had eaten not over half a dozen mouthfuls.

"Certainly you are not well," he said. "I think the doctor should see you." And then he nodded his head and his small eyes gleamed with a brilliant thought. "I know a medicine better than a doctor's." He stood up and his fingers were working at the chain of keys at his belt. Francois watched them and saw the thin, old, brass key which he slipped off. "A bottle of wine of our Italian ancestors—yours and mine, Beaupre"—the count chuckled—"that will cure you of your ills for this evening at least." He slid the key into the lock and said, half to himself, "My little brass friend never leaves the belt of Albrecht von Gersdorf except to do him a pleasure, bless him!" And then, "Hold the candle Beaupre—well, come along down—it can do no harm and I can't manage a light and two bottles."

So Francois followed down the twisted, headlong, stone staircase and found himself, after rather a long descent, holding the lamp high, gazing curiously about the walls of a large stone room lined with shelves, filled with bottles.

"A show, isn't it?" the Count von Gersdorf demanded. "Here, hold the light on this side," and he went on talking. "The wine is so old that I think it must have been stocked before the time of the last lord of the castle."

And Francois, holding the light, remembering the Marquis Zappi, thought so too. The count pointed to a square stone in the wall which projected slightly, very slightly.

"That is the door to a secret stock of some sort, I have always thought," he said. "Probably some wonderful old stuff saved for the coming of age of the heir, or a great event of that sort. I wish I could get at it," and he stared wistfully at the massive block. "But I cannot stir it. And I don't let anyone but myself down here—not I." The count turned away and they mounted the two stories of narrow steps, for the governor's rooms were on the second floor, and the staircase ran from it between walls, down underground. "The old chaps must have thought a lot of their wine to have the cellar connect directly with their own rooms—for Battista tells me these were always the rooms of the Za—of the lords of the castle," the governor explained.

And to Francois, considering it, the fact seemed an odd one. And then the governor set to work drinking Pietro's wine, and little thought, as he urged it on his prisoner, how much more right to it the prisoner had than he. It was a wonderful old liquid, full of a strange dim sparkle, and of most exquisite bouquet. As he drank it Francois silently toasted its owner on his return to his own again. He took so little as to disgust the governor, but it put fresh life into him, and when at last he could leave the count, who was by that time more than fairly drunk, he went up to his cold prison under the roof quieter and more at peace than he had been for months.

CHAPTER XVII.

A Loaf of Bread.

The next morning Battista came in with a manner which to the observing eye of his prisoner foretold distinctly some event. He talked more than usual, and more gruffly and loudly, but at last, after wandering about the room some minutes, all the time talking, scolding, he swooped on Francois and thrust a thick paper into his coat and at the same instant his heavy left hand was over Francois' mouth.

"Not a word," he whispered, and then— "The loaf of bread."

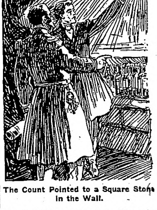
Francois, struck dumb and blind, turned hot and cold, and his shaking hand in his coat pocket clutched the letter.

But Battista prodded him with his hard forefinger. "Be careful," he muttered, and then again, "The bread"—with a sharp prod—"The loaf of bread" —and the door had clanged. Battista was gone.

A strong man, who had not been shut away from life, would likely have read the letter instantly, would instantly have examined the long round loaf lying before him. Francois was ill and weak and it was the first word for five years from his own people, which lay in his hand; he sat as if turned to stone, touching the paper as if that were enough; he sat perhaps fifteen minutes.

Then suddenly a breathlessness came over him that something might happen before he could read it—this writing which, whatever it should say, meant life and death to him. Taking care not to rustle the paper, deadening the sound under his bedclothes, he read it, kneeling by the bed. It was four letters—from his mother and Alexe and the general and Pietro; but the first three were short. He felt, indeed, reading them, that no words had been written, that only the arms of the people he loved had strained about him and their faces laid against his, and that so, wordlessly, they had told him but one thing—their undying love. Weak, lonely, his intense temperament stretched to the breaking point by the last three months of fearful hope, it was more than he could bear. He put the papers against his cheek and his head dropped on the bed, and a storm of tears tore his soul and body. But it was dangerous; he must not be off his guard; he remembered that swiftly, and with shaking fingers he opened Pietro's letter—Pietro's letter which, yellowed and faded but distinct yet, in the small, clear writing, is guarded today with those other letters in the mahogany desk in Virginia.

"My dear brother Francois," the letter began, and quick tears came again at that word "brother," which said so much. "My dear brother Francois—this is not to tell you how I have searched for you and never forgotten you. I will tell you that when I see you. This is to tell you how to get out of that house of mine which has held you as a prisoner when you ought to have been its welcome guest. When Italy is free we will do that over; but we must get you free first. Francois, I am now within five miles of you—"



The Count Pointed to a Square Stone in the Wall.

The man on his knees by the prison bed gasped; the letters staggered before his eyes.

"I am living on a ship, and I will explain how I got it when I see you, in a few days now, Francois. Every night for a week, beginning with tonight, there will be a person watching for you in Riders' Hollow, from midnight till daylight. After that we shall go away for two weeks so as to avoid giving suspicion, and then repeat the arrangement again every night for a week. You do not know Riders' Hollow, and it is unnecessary to tell you more about it than that it is a lonely place hidden in trees, and supposed to be haunted by ghosts of men on horseback; the people about will not go there for love or money except in broad daylight.

Lee, of Long Prairie has got into the governor race. Eberhart supporters has made him believe that he is very popular just now. Who will be the next assistant?

It worked all right for Eberhart to put a crowd of candidates into the field against himself two years ago, but the same game will not work twice, for any school boy can plainly see that that game is being worked by the Eberhart crowd to assure his nomination. Of course it means the turning over of the state to the democratic party, which will likely mean the election of the next U.S. Senator from this state by that party.

Tuesday was the ground hog day. That is the day that the ground hog is supposed to crawl out of his hole and look for his shadow. If he don't see his shadow it is supposed to either crawl back into his hole and stay six weeks or stay out, and we have forgot which. The trouble with us up here is that we have not got any ground hogs, so we will have to take the weather as it comes. We never heard of but one ground hog in this part of the country, and some boys over in the town of Mayfield caught that one some four years ago, and sold the hide to Stephen Singer for a prime mink skin, and got $6.00 for it. But hog or no hog, shadow or no shadow they can't kick the facts out of Northern Minnesotians that we have had an ideal winter so far, and we are prepared to take in a few cold snaps if the weather clerk dishes them up to us.

Governor Eberhart is opposed to the proposition to have representatives of the different candidates meet and decide which is to make the race against Gov. Eberhart. Naturally he would, One man can win out where a dozen would only increase the chances for a re-election of the present administration.—The Deerwood Times,

There will be one man running against Adolph before fall, if he wins that nomination, and you just watch the people clean up that state house gang, proper. If he tries to mount the republican Elephant to ride into office, she will "buck" him off and break his neck. The people are beginning to get "wised up" to that smooth trick of putting three or four candidates, with practically the same platform, into the field in opposition to him, and all the democrats have got to do is to nominate a good man, sit down and smoke their pipes, and the people will do the rest. Eberhart stands in the same position to-day that Taft did two years ago, and it don't matter by what tricks he gets the nomination he will not be elected for the next governor of Minnesota.

The young men on the farms who read the city dailys should read the dark side of city life as well as the bright side. Of course it is nice to make a few hundred daily by speculators, and enjoy the sights of the city, but it is not very pleasant to stand in the bread line and wait for a pound loaf to be handed out to you to keep you from starving. Remember young farmer boys that there are two sides to city life, the bright and the dark side and if you should happen to get into the latter class you will wish to be back on the farm.

The state machine will vote solid for Eberhart, while the opposition have lost all interest in the primary election, so far as the governor is concerned for there is now enough candidates in the field in opposition to him to assure his nomination, but the people will take a fall out of the "gang" in November.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate, I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered,

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities,

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON,
Thief River Falls, Minn.

A THIRTY-YEAR RECORD.

(Buffalo Journal.)

The editor of this paper sincerely believes that the true solution for at least the beginning of government reform may be found in the platform of Samuel G. Iverson, which is published in another column. Mr. Iverson has been in office continuously for thirty years. During that time we have had a panorama of "statehouse rings," machines and organizations. There have been a large number of these machines in power in that time, with but few men who have been carried over as members from one to the other, and then lasting no longer than two machines. It is very evident that Mr. Iverson has not been closely tied up with any of them, or he would have gone the way of all the others long ago. We have no doubt he has used them, but only by playing around the edges and not getting entangled in the meshes. He has kept a clean record through it all, and it is a matter of common knowledge that such a record is difficult to maintain, as he has been in a position to be sorely tempted.

HAS BEST OF IT ON ISSUES.

(Owatonna Journal-Chronicle.)

Returning to the consideration of candidates, it would appear that Mr. Iverson has a little the best of the governor as to other issues. He declared himself for vigorous law enforcement, which has never been Eberhart's strong suit, and he audaciously challenges the "invisible government", which everyone knows stands behind Governor Eberhart in the agency of Ed Smith. We rather like it, whether Mr. Iverson really means anything by it or not. Mr. Iverson, too, has had the benefit of some thirty years of experience in public office, mostly in important positions, such as that of state auditor, in which he should have gained a knowledge excelling that of any other man as to the workings of the state government. He ought to be a fine adviser for a constitutional convention. Some may object that Mr. Iverson has been in public office long enough, but that is a puerile objection. We don't, or at least should not, parcel out offices as gifts or rewards, but rather should bend our efforts towards selecting the best man for an office, for the welfare of the public service.

NEVER PART OF THE "ORGANIZATION."

(Albert Lea Tribune.)

In another column will be found the announcement of the candidacy of Samuel G. Iverson for the governorship of Minnesota on the Republican ticket, subject to the action of the primaries, next June. Mr. Iverson is one of the best known men in the state and has hosts of friends everywhere, who will hope for his success.

His platform, contained in his announcement, is one which will command wide attention, inasmuch as it touches upon the leading questions which concern the business affairs of the state and upon the matter of economy in state expenses as well.

Mr. Iverson has never been openly identified with the Ed Smith organization, nor has he ever trained with the progressive elements of the Republican party, and yet his platform utterances are most progressive.

IVERSON A LIVE WIRE.

(Litchfield News-Ledger.)

The long expected has finally transpired. State Auditor Samuel G. Iverson has announced himself as a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor of Minnesota, subject to the will of the voters of this state at the next primary campaign. This announcement settles the fact that there will be a solid fight against the renomination of Mr. Eberhart by a man as widely known as he is and with a record of which he has no occasion to feel ashamed. As in the past the opposition to Mr. Iverson will endeavor to spring a multiplicity of candidates in the hope of securing a plurality majority, but the Ledger opines that the people of Minnesota have profited by past experiences and will not submit to having their majority will thwarted by the shrewd manipulation of men who prosper and thrive upon such tactics. Sam Iverson will have to be reckoned upon as a live wire from this time on until the primaries close.

GOOD CHANCE FOR SUCCESS.

(Ada Index.)

State Auditor Samuel Iverson announces his candidacy for the Republican nomination for governor, and his chances for success are good. In view of recent extravagance state appropriations and a greatly increased state tax rate the time is ripe for a business administration and a thorough reorganization of the various state departments. His platform includes economy and law enforcement, fewer boards and commissions, the extension of civil service in state administration, woman suffrage and development of our resources. Mr. Iverson is more familiar with the business end of the state administration than any other man, as his duties as auditor bring these matters before him daily and he is exceptionally well qualified to carry out the economical business reforms the state so badly needs. His platform is a timely one.

PEOPLE [illegible] VOTE [illegible] THE MAN.

(Clearbrook Journal.)

Hon. Samuel G. Iverson, Minnesota's popular state auditor, has declared himself a full fledged candidate for governor of the great state of Minnesota. With Iverson a declared candidate for the highest office within the gift of the people in this state the governor question in Minnesota is settled for some time to come, because the people are going to vote for the man regardless of politics, and that means that Mr. Iverson will be our next governor.

HOLDING THE STEERING WHEEL.

(Granite Falls Journal.)

Sam G. Iverson, state auditor, is now a full fledged candidate for governor, having announced his candidacy this week. His platform has the right ring to it; in fact it is quite a model. He takes a whack at what he calls the "invisible government" and says it "should be dragged from its place of hiding, exposed to bright rays of publicity and stripped of all influence and power in legislative and government affairs." That sounds good. Most people who have kept up with political events have been satisfied that there was an "invisible" hand holding the steering wheel, but we are surprised that Sam had nerve enough to come out and say so.

We received the lengthy platform and announcement of Wm. E. Lee, of Long Prairie last night, which he wants published with editorial comment. We have fully expressed our views on this multitude of candidates, in opposition to Eberhart, and we don't propose to publish any of their political rot written at Eberhart headquaters. Sam Iverson is candidate enough in opposition to Eberhart, and the ones that have come in later are there simply for the purpose of drawing votes enough away from him to give Eberhart the nomination.

Austrian Censorship.

The Austrian censor used to play strange tricks with the plays produced under his auspices. When Schiller's "Maid of Orleans" was produced at Vienna in 1822 the title was deemed too flippant and was replaced by that of "Joan of Arc." Agnes Sorel figured as the wife of Charles VII. and Queen Ysabeau was transformed into that monarch's sister in order to save him from bigamy. Until 1842 mesalliances were prohibited on the Vienna stage. When the burgtheater wished to stage one of Freytag's plays in which Count Waldemar marries a gardener's daughter the censor put his foot down. "These incidents" he said, "may unfortunately occur in real life, but they must not be seen on the stage."

HOUSE IN WHICH THOMAS LINCOLN DIED, IN COLES COUNTY, ILLINOIS

On February 12 of every year the mind of every American loyal citizen is momentarily turned to the thought that upon that day, just so many years ago, Abraham Lincoln, one of the world's greatest men, was born. The approaching birthday of the great martyred president awakens the American people to the realization that this is the one hundred and fifth anniversary of London's birthday. Some merely give the celebration a though, but those who have made the life of Abraham Lincoln a study look upon the birthday anniversary as something more than the mere passing of a milestone.

Historians say that Lincoln was born in Hardin county, Kentucky. In fact, he was born in La Rue county, which, however, is a subdivision of Hardin county. Chroniclers continue with their biographies and say that he, together with his father, mother and a sister, went to Indiana and entered a claim to a piece of land in Spencer county. As a matter of fact, he entered a claim to a piece of land in Warrick county, but which has since been set aside and named Spencer county. The Lincolns went to Indiana in 1816, the same year that Indiana was admitted to the Union as a state. He entered a quarter section of land, built a log cabin and lived there until 1830.

It was known that Thomas Lincoln, father of Abraham Lincoln, was in poor circumstances. To say that Abraham Lincoln was the son of a poor carpenter and farmer gives an insight to the hard conditions that little Abe had to face when he was a youngster. When he went to indiana he was just seven, and, remaining in Indiana until 1830, he spent 14 years of his life in Indiana, or until he was twenty-one years of age.

It is useless to relate the idle tales of his boyhood; but when he verged into manhood and imbibed into his character those qualities and those traits that led up to his greatness, this part of his life is interesting. It is well understood that if Lincoln had done as other boys of his day he would have achieved only small things. But he did not do as the young men and boys of his day, and the ways of his early manhood are still interesting to young America who strive for success and do things.

Lincoln saw hardships, had meager clothing, coarse food and no advantages of securing an education. All who knew him agreed that he was unlike other boys. He was not fully understood, doubtless holding his real character or disposition in reserve for his intimate friends only. He was not fond of work, but whether from sheer laziness or because he was fonder of mental exercise in reading or otherwise is not clear. He enjoyed books and is known to have borrowed much of the reading matter of his neighborhood.

After 1820 Spencer county had, at Rockport, its county seat, a public library of several hundred volumns of the standard works of that day. Thomas Lincoln and Abraham Lincoln were at Rockport at least two times during the year, but the name of Abraham Lincoln does not appear as a borrower of books at the library. The field from which Abraham Lincoln could glean knowledge in that neighborhood was very limited, though he borrowed every book that he could get. The list is a short one, and the following includes most of them: "Robinson Crusoe," "Aesop's Fables," Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," Weems' "Life of Washington" and a history of the United States.

During Abraham Lincoln's 16 years of life in Indiana he had read and reread this list of literary and historical books over and over again. His good nature among Lincoln City people was not unnoticed; all agreed to his honesty and good nature. Questions of dispute and petty differences were at first submitted to him in a joking way, and later in a sincere way, until he was complimented for his honest and just way in settling disputes and differences. He was told more times than once that some day he would turn out to be a lawyer.

Having read all the literary books and what few there were of law in and around Rockport, Lincoln heard of the court at Boonville. He resolved to go down to that place, 20 miles distant, and learn what he could in the real court, which was in session there several times during the year. The court house in Boonville, then a small hamlet of less than 300 inhabitants—in strong contrast to the beautiful new structure that now adorns the beautiful little town—stood in the very sport where the new one now stands, in the center of a large court square. It was a frame building; the architecture was, to say the least, very novel. A ditch two feet wide and two feet deep, was filled with smoothly hewn logs, on which was built a stone wall 18 inches high. This furnished the foundation upon which the building proper rested. The buiding itself was never entirely completed. It was weather boarded, but neither plastered nor lathed. It remained in this condition until 1836, which was after the Lincoln family had moved to Illinois. It was capable of holding only 100 people and could only be used in the summer. In the night the cattle which grazed about town would go there for shelter. Such was the structure where President Lincoln received his first impulse to become a lawyer. Here it was that he received his rudimentary practice in pleading cases that afterward aided in making him the lawyer of the reputation he had.

It was to attend court in this rudely constructed building that the young man walked 20 miles from Lincoln City to Boonville, Ind. He was an ardent listener and the lessons that he painted upon his memory at this place are the ones that inspired the great man to become the lawyer he afterward became. And from this act the little town of Boonville claims the distinction of furnishing to him the material that aided in his after success.

To claim so great a distinction if it could not be verified would be false and unfair; but from the history of young Lincoln while he was a visitor here attending court, and from the assurance that he received the knowledge he did, which inspired him to become the lawyer he did, it is another laurel for the little city in southerin Indiana.

John A. Brackenridge, then the ablest lawyer in southern Indiana and a practitioner in the court at Boonville, noticed the eagerness and the earnestness of this young man in the Boonville court room. He inquired into his purposes and from what part of the country he hailed. Young Lincoln, who stood then over six feet, by his awkward and convincing conversation, impressed the distinguished jurist with an admiration for the man. He found by conversing with him that he was a reader of good books, was interested in law and even had some "hankering" to study it some day.

Accordingly, Mr. Brackenridge, being a hospitable man, invited the young man to his home to stay all night. He also told him that he had some books of interest to beginners and that he would be only too glad to lend them to him to read. Brackenridge lived three miles west of Boonville on his farm and had a library there. His old homestead still stands, and, though a century old, has been used as a tenant's home until very recently. His office, in which was stored his books, yet shows plainly the marks of the place where was located at that time the best library in southern Indiana, if not in the state. The room is but 8 by 10 feet, and, being pressed for room, Mr. Brackenridge had his books placed upon shelves above two windows. When Lincoln caught his first glance of the library he was astonished at so great a collection of books. Mr. Brackenridge was the author of a book in the interest of the Presbyterian church and had several books for sale at that time. The first night found Lincoln up until after the midnight hour reading by the glare of the burning logs in the fireplace.

Many days after this found Lincoln attending court at Boonville regularly. More often was he found reading books in the private library of Mr. Brackenridge

The greater part of the Brackenridge library is still in existence, though some of the books are torn and time-worn and show that they have been made brown before the blazes of the open fireside. They are owned by different lawyers in Boonville and are valued highly because they are the books read by the great war president when he resolved to study law.

Upon one occasion Lincoln attended a murder trial at Boonville and heard the case from beginning to end. The trial seemed interesting to him, but the most exciting feature of the whole case was the argument before the jury. The most eloquent plea and argument was made by a Kentucky lawyer named Brackenridge, a kin to John A. Brackenridge of Indiana. After his argument before the jury all of the prominent men in the court room rose to congratulate him. Lincoln was in the court room at the time and he was anxious to shake hands with the eminent jurist in appreciation of his effort in behalf of his client.

Lincoln pushed himself through the crowd up to the attorney and when he stretched out his hand to shake, Mr. Brackenridge pushed him aside and shook hands with those whom he considered more prominent. Lincoln was smitten by this act and always remembered the name of Brackenridge, the attorney from Kentucky.

Several years after, at the second inauguration of Lincoln, thousands of people greeted the great war president. Hundreds of this number came from Kentucky, and among the number was this man Brackenridge. Recognizing him at once as the man who ignored him at Boonville several years previous, Lincoln grasped the man's hand with a hearty shake and said:

"I am more than glad to see you than any man I know of. I have always wanted to congratulate you upon that speech you made at Boonville several years ago."

Lincoln did not have to tell Brackenridge upon that occasion he ignored him, when he was a poor, struggling man, for Brackenridge followed with a complete apology.

MOST MODEST OF MEN

Abraham Lincoln felt deeply the responsibility that rested on him as president of the United States, but he shrank from assuming any of the honors, or even the titles, of his position.

After years of intimate acquaintance a public man testified shortly after Mr. Lincoln's death that he could not recall a single instance in which he spoke of himself as president, or used that title for himself, except when he acted in an official capacity.

He always spoke of his position and office vaguely, as "this place," "here," or in other modest phrase. Once, speaking of the room at the capitol used by the president of the United States at the close of a session of congress, he said, "That room, you know, that they call"—dropping his voice and hesitating—"the president's room."

To an intimate friend who addressed him always by his own proper title, he said, "Now call me Lincoln, and I'll promise not to tell of the breach of etiquette—if you won't—and I shall have a resting spell from 'Mr. President.'"

All persons agree that the most marked characteristic of Mr. Lincoln's manners was his simplicity and artlessness, but his native dignity never forsook him, and with all his angularities and disregard of conventionalities, distinguished foreigners were invariably impressed by his fine fiber.

A diplomat, whose knowledge of courts was more perfect than that of the English language, said:

"He seems to me one grand gentilhomme in disguise."—Youth's Companion.

A Doctor's First Question Is ______?

"How are Your Bowels?" A Simple Remedy that Guarantees Good Bowel Action.

Trace the origin of the commoner ills of life and almost invariably you will find that constipation was the cause. It is not to be expected that a mass of fermented food can remain in the system beyond its time without vitiating the blood and affecting the nerves and muscles. It congests the entire body.

The results are colds, fevers, piles, headaches, and nervousness, with its accompanying indigestion and sleeplessness. There is only one thing to do, and that is to remove the trouble; and when nature seems unable to do it, outside aid is necessary. You will find the best of all outside aids a remedy that many thousands are now using for this very purpose, called Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Many hundreds of letters are received by Dr. Caldwell telling of the good results obtained, and among the enthusiastic letters is one from Lieut. G. W. Vaughan, of 623 W. North St., Decatur, Ill. He is 72 and has had a bad liver and stomach since he came out of the army. He says he tried about everything, but never succeeded in getting permanent relief until he took Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. He is never without a bottle in the house, and he is never without good health.

It has untold advantages over pills, salts and the various coarse cathartics and purgatives, for while these do but temporary good, Syrup Pepsin cures permanently. The effect of its action is to train the stomach and bowel muscles to do their work naturally again, and in a short time all forms of medicine can be dispensed with. It can be bought without inconvenience at any nearby drug store for fifty cents and one dollar a bottle, the latter size being regularly bought by those who already know its value. Results are always guaranteed or money will be refunded.

Families wishing to try a free sample bottle can obtain it postpaid by addressing Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 Washington St., Monticello, Ill. A postal card with your name and address on it will do.

After Old Gentleman Spoke, Further Figuring Was in the Nature of Wasted Time.

"I've figured the whole thing out, father," said Mabel. "The car, to begin with, will cost $5,000, which at six per cent., is $300 a year. If we charge ten per cent. off for depreciation it will come to $500 more. A good chauffeur can be had for $125 a month, or $1,500 a year. I have allowed ten dollar a month for repairs. The chauffeur's uniform and furs will come to about $200. Now, let's see what it comes to: Three hundred plus five hundred—"

"Don't bother, my dear; I know what it comes to," said the old gentleman.

"What?" asked the girl.

"My dear," said the father, impressively, "it comes to a standstill, right here and now."

Four-Footed Poultry.

A certain old man in the Wynchope settlement, named Bickley, was exceedingly fond of "big words." He was riding his horse over the country one bright spring day, apparently intent on some important business.

Whenever he met anybody, he gravely asked: "Have you seen anything of any stray poultry today? I've lost mine, and am hunting it." When they told him "No," he would proceed on his way.

After spending several hours in what seemed to be a vain search, he at last rode to the door of a farmhouse and called: "Hello!" A lady came to the door, and doffing his hat very politely, the old man inquired if she had "noticed and stray poultry 'round?"

After a moment's thought the woman told him she had seen no chickens.

"Oh," he replied "it's my hogs that I've lost—not my chickens."—Youth's Companion.

ANOTHER COFFEE WRECK

What's the Use When There's an Easy Way Out?

Along with the coffee habit has grown the prevalent "American Disease"—nervous prostration.

The following letter shows the way out of the trouble:

"Five years ago I was a great coffee drinker and from its use I became so nervous I could scarcely sleep at all nights. My condition grew worse and worse until finally the physician I consulted declared my troubles were due to coffee.

"But being so wedded to the beverage I did not see how I could do without it, especially at breakfast, as that meal seemed incomplete without coffee.

"On a visit, my friends deprived me of coffee to prove that it was harmful. At the end of about eight days I was less nervous, but the craving for coffee was intense, so I went back to the old habit as soon as I got home and the old sleepless nights came near making a wreck of me.

"I heard of Postum and decided to try it. I did not like it at first, because, as I afterwards discovered, it was not made properly. I found, however, that when made after directions on the package, it was delicious.

"It had a soothing effect on my nerves, and none of the bad effects that coffee had, so I bade farewell to coffee and have used only Postum since. The most wonderful account of the benefit to be derived from Postum could not exceed my own experience."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

All in the Badge.

Little Everett was a member of the Band of Mercy society, and was proud of the membership. He wore his badge, a small star, as if it were a policeman's insignia, and was often heard reproving other boys and girls for cruel treatment of dogs and cats.

One morning a woman of the neighborhood heard a commotion outside Everett's home, and, going to the window, was surprised to find Everett in the act of tormenting the cat.

"Why, Everett," she called, "what are you doing to that poor cat? I thought you belonged to the Band of Mercy society."

"I did," replied the little boy, "but I lost my star."—Lippincott's.

QUICKLY STOPS THE WORST BACKACHE

Croxone Makes Kidney Troubles, Bladder Disorders, Rheumatic Pains Vanish.

If you suffer with backaching kidney trouble, have disagreeable bladder and urinary disorders, or are tortured with rheumatism, stiff joints, and its heart-wrenching pains, you will be surprised how quickly and surely Croxone will relieve all such troubles.

It soaks right in through the walls, membranes and linings, neutralizes, dissolves and makes the kidneys sift out and filter away the uric acid and poisons from the blood, and leaves the kidneys and urinary organs clean, strong, healthy and well.

It matters not how long you have suffered, how old you are, or what you have used, it is practically impossible to take Croxone without results. It starts to work the minute you take it and is guaranteed to relieve you the first time you use it, or cost you nothing.

If you suffer with pains in your back and sides, or have any signs of kidney, bladder trouble, or rheumatism, such as puffy swellings under the eyes or in the feet and ankles, if you are nervous, tired and run down, or bothered with urinary disorders, Croxone really will relieve your misery and do it quickly. An original package costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if it fails in a single case.—Adv.

Where Living Is High.

Those who complain of the high cost of living would have reason for a much more pronounced howl if they lived for a short time in La Paz in Lower California. Butter is never sold for less than 65 cents a pound and during the seven hot months of the year fresh vegetables are not at all obtainable. Ice which is manufactured in La Paz, sells for two dollars a hundred.

HAD MOTHER IN A CORNER

Rash Promise Bound to Go Unfulfilled, of Marion Got What She Wished For.

Little Marion is very fond of turkey, we learn from Lippincott's Magazine. At Thanksgiving she was invited to her grandmother's, where there was an old-fashioned turkey dinner. Marion ate a good share of the bird, and then handed up her plate again.

"I want some more turkey, mother," said the child.

"Why, Marion," said the mother, "you have eaten enough already. I don't think you had better have any more now."

"But I want some more, mother," and her face fell.

"Not now, my dear," replied her mother; "but here is a wishbone that you may pull with mother. That will be lots of fun. You pull one side, and I will pull the other, and whoever gets the longer end can have her wish come true."

Each pulled until the bone snapped. Marion had the longer end.

"Now, dear," said mother, "you've got the longer end. What did you wish for?"

"Why, mother," responded the child, as she picked up her plate, "I wished for more turkey."

Why He Missed It.

While traveling on a steamboat a notorious card sharper, who wished to get into the good graces of a clergyman who was on board, said to the reverend gentleman:

"I should very much like to hear one of your sermons, sir."

"Well," replied the clergyman, "you could have heard me last Sunday if you had been where you should have been."

"Where was that, then?"

"In the county jail," was the answer.

GOPHER NEWS NOTES.

Minnesota Events of the Week in Condensed Form.

Bingham Lake.—The school in district No. 66 has been closed on account of smallpox.

Faribault.—The first annual show of the Cannon Valley Poultry association opened in Faribault Tuesday.

Winona.—The midwinter reunion of Scottish Rite Masons was held here. A large class took the degrees.

East Grand Forks. — Just a year from the time she was widowed by the accidental death of her husband, Chokio.—Charles E. McAllen has been appointed postmaster of Chokio to succeed A. F. Riedner, who resigned.

Albert Lea.—The Rentz Manufacturing company of Wells has filed a petition of voluntary bankruptcy in the federal court.

Le Sueur Center.—William Sapp, a farmer living near here, sold two calves in the local market which brought him $90.60.

Anoka.—Burglars entered the homes of T. T. Geddes and G. H. Goodrich while the families were absent. Only a small amount of booty was secured.

Ortonville. — In the case against Peter Hansen and Emil Banson, tried in district court here for selling liquor to minors, the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty.

Ada.—A woman's civic league has been organized here with a membership of about fifty. Mrs. W. B. Holmes was elected president, Mrs. C. C. Allen vice president, Mrs. E. W. Zanzow secretary, and Mrs. D. E. Fulton treasurer.

a fireman, in a wreck near this city, Mrs. J. H. McGowan was led to the altar to become the bride of Frank Wavra, another fireman. The bridegroom was a member of the train crew with McGowan when the latter met his death.

Caledonia.—At the annual meeting of the Farmers' Stock and Grain company in this city the following officers were elected: President, George Meyer; vice president, John Duffy; secretary, D. C. Merlo; treasurer, J. A. Heymann; directors, Peter Schmitt and M. C. Rahm.

St. Cloud.—Four generations were represented at a family reunion in St. Joseph, this county, when Mrs. Angeline Linnemann, a pioneer, observed her eighty-first natal anniversary. Mrs. Linnemann recounted many incidents of the sixty years she has lived here. She told her great grandchildren about the Indians and of her personal experiences during the outbreaks.

St. Cloud.—Three addresses before a large congregation closed the convocation of the Mississippi valley deanery at the Episcopal church in this city. Rev. H. F. Parshall of Cass Lake, formerly rector of the local parish; Rev. C. C. Rollit, general secretary of this missionary department, Minneapolis, and Rev. Louis R. Levering of St. Cloud delivered addresses.

Mankato. — The commissioner of finance, the city clerk and city treasurer of Anoka paid Mankato a visit last week, with a view of getting information of the working of the commission form of government, Anoka having just adopted the plan. Under the old system the finances could not be kept in good condition. From Mankato the visitors went to Faribault on a similar errand.

Brainerd.—In the presence of their children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren, Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Lynch celebrated their sixtieth wedding anniversary. The children are J. C. Lynch of Milwaukee, Dr. E. W. Lynch of Minneapolis, Richard of Belle Plaine, Mathew of Gull River, Charles of Washington state, Joseph of Buffalo, N. Y., and the Misses Mary and Catherine.

Bird Island.—The fifth annual show of the Renville County Poultry association was the most successful of its exhibitions. More than 400 birds were on display and rated under the score card system. A. C. Smith of the University of Minnesota agricultural college acted as judge. A corn and grain show, a new project for Renville county, was held in connection with the poultry show. On Wednesday, Thursday and Friday the visitors attended a farmers' institute held under the direction of W. E. Morris, the county agent. The lecturers included several members of the faculty of the state extension department.

Fergus Falls.—An interesting case was argued before Judge Roeser of St. Cloud in the district court here. This city voted against license a year ago, and has since been without saloons, but the Fergus Brewing company, which owns a brewery inside of the city limits, claims the right to sell beer to farmers in wholesale quantities. The city denies this right, contending that the sale is absolutely prohibited under the law. The brewery sold a case of beer to G. J. Qualle of the town of Tumuli, and the police seized it before he left the city. A charge was preferred against the brewing company, and its right to sell is being tested. It is probable the case will be carried to the supreme court.

Graceville.—The tenth annual banquet of the Graceville Commercial club was a very successful affair. Plates were laid for 165, delegates coming from nearly all the adjoining villages. Frank Valesh, mayor, acted as toastmaster and addresses were delivered by D. W. Lawler of St. Paul, Professor J. H. Sherlock of Minneapolis, Senator E. Rustad of Wheaton and Frank W. Murphy of Wheaton. The club is one of the liveliest organizations of its kind in this part of the state. This being the tenth anniversary of its birth, the banquet was in the nature of a jubilee.

No Rest—No Peace

There's no rest and but little peace for a person whose kidneys are out of order.

Lame in the morning, suffering cricks in the back and sharp stabs of pain with every sudden strain, the day is just one round of pain and trouble.

It would be strange if all-day backache did not wear on the temper, but it is not only on that account that people who suffer with weak kidneys are nervous, cross and irritable.

Uric acid is poison to the nerves, and when the kidneys are not working well, this acid collects in the blood and works upon the nerves, causing headache, dizziness, languor, an inclination to worry over trifles, and a suspicious, short temper.

Rheumatic pain, neuralgia, sciatica, lumbago, neuritis and gravel are further steps in uric acid poisoning.

Don't neglect kidney weakness. An aching back, with unnatural passages of the kidney secretions, is cause enough to suspect the kidneys. Use Doan's Kidney Pills, a remedy which has been used for years, the world over, for weak kidneys, backache, irregular kidney action and uric acid trouble. Thousands of grateful recommendations throughout the country prove their worth.

LAID UP IN BED

Gave Up All Hope of Recovery

Mrs. Frank L. Mann, 1000 W. Main St., Vermillion, S. Dak., says: "When I was six years old I had diptheria and it left my kidneys and bladder very weak. From that time until I was seventeen years old, I had kidney weakness, but as I got older I thought I would outgrow the trouble. I didn't however, and as time passed I got worse. My feet and limbs were terribly swollen and I couldn't wear my shoes. My back was so stiff I could hardly bend over and I was laid up in bed for over a month. I lost much weight and in spite of the doctors' medicine, I didn't improve. Dizzy spells came over me and my sight was affected. Finally I gave up the doctors in despair and life certainly looked blue. I didn't think I would ever be well again. When everything else had failed, a friend urged me to try Doan's Kidney Pills and I did. After I took the first box, I noticed improvement and gradually the ailments left me. I picked up in weight and strength and by the time I had used eight boxes of Doan's Kidney Pills I was cured. I have never had any sign of kidney trouble since."

ECZEMA ON ENTIRE SCALP

R. F. D. No. 2, Sunfield, Mich.—"I was troubled with eczema. It began with a sore on the top of the scalp, broke out as a pimple and grew larger until it was a large red spot with a crust or scab over it. This became larger finally covering the entire scalp and spread to different parts of the body, the limbs and back and in the ears. These sores grew larger gradually until some were as large as a quarter of a dollar. They would itch and if scratched they would bleed and smart. The clothing would irritate them at night when it was being removed causing them to itch and smart so I could not sleep. A watery fluid would run from them. My scalp became covered with a scale and when the hair was raised up it would raise this scale; the hair was coming out terribly.

"I treated about six months and got no relief and after using Cuticura Soap and Ointment with two applications we could notice a great difference. It began to get better right away. In a month's time I was completely cured." (Signed) Mrs. Bertha Underwood, Jan. 3, 1913.

The Woman Who Never Has Her Change Ready.

Have you ever noticed how many women go to a ticket window in the subway or on the elevated, ask for their ticket, and even expect to have it in their hands before they begin to look for the nickel to pay for it?

Have you ever waited in line while a woman in front of the ticket seller opened her shopping bag, took out her handkerchief, groped for her pocketbook and, when she found it, lingeringly searching through its compartments for a five-cent piece?

A woman is unfortunate in having no convenient pocket that she can dip into for small change. Her money is usually inside something that is inside something else. But isn't this all the more reason why she should have the consideration and forethought to get out her change in advance in order not to delay others?

Needless to say, the woman who holds up the line at the subway ticket office does the same thing when she buys theater seats or railway tickets.

Hers is a prominent place among public pests.

Magnificent Crops in all Western Canada

All parts of the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have produced wonderful yields of Wheat, Oats, Barley and Flax. Wheat graded from Contract to No. 1 Hard, weighed heavy and yielded from 20 to 45 bushels per acre; 22 bushels was about the total average. Mixed Farming may be considered fully as profitable an industry as grain raising. The excellent grasses full of nutrition, are the only food required either for beef or dairy purposes. In 1912, and again in 1913, at Chicago, Manitoba carried off the Championship for beef steer. Good schools, markets convenient, climate excellent. For the homesteader, the man who wishes to farm extensively, or the investor, Canada offers the biggest opportunity of any place on the continent.

The Burning of Batoum

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman.)

Two years ago, when the revolutionary movement in Russia was at its height and frightful excesses, perpetrated both by the government and the Nihilists, were reported daily in all the newspapers of western lands, the world was appalled to learn that a great part of Batoum, the largest city in the Caucasus, had been consumed by fire.

Batoum is the center of the Russian oil-refining business. It is the only place that rivals the Pennsylvanian and Kansan fields. Inexhaustible gushers of petroleum exist everywhere in its vicinity, and oil-ships from Batoum pass oil-vessels from New York harbor on every sea. Naturally, a Russian city of this description is a hot-bed of revolution. Persians, Russians, Tartars, Turks, Khivans—men from all eastern countries, all equally infected with Nihilist doctrines, work side by side in the refineries.

A feature of the conflagration, which though half forgotten amid the greater disaster, excited much speculation at the time, was the blowing up of the oil-ship Caspian, which lay in the harbor.

This is how the series of events began. A general strike had been proclaimed by the Nihilists, in answer to the edict establishing martial law in the city. The refinery owners, whose interests made them close allies of the government, had grown equally embittered and exasperated. The refineries were all situated upon the water-front, and a large number of strike-breakers had been employed by the owners and lodged and fed within these buildings, so that the strikers could not approach them. There they worked, night and day.

Out in the basin lay the Caspian, waiting to take on board a cargo of refined oil for Glasgow. The revolutionists had sworn that she should not sail. Nikolai and I had hurried to Batoum at the first outbreak of trouble; he was at the head of the inner section of the party, and if the strike succeeded in bringing the government to terms, it would immensely increase their prestige throughout the Russian empire; it would even react upon St. Petersburg, where the czar had just convoked the duma and was wavering between constitutionalism and absolutism.

All hinged upon one thing. If the Caspian sailed with her cargo of oil, it would demonstrate that the revolutionists' cause was hopeless. She must not sail. But how was the threat to be translated into action? The police boats patrolled the stretch of water that lay between the vessel and the land. Moreover, it was not necessary to bring the Caspian to the dock, for a pipe line had been laid down between her and the refinery, and through this the crude oil, when ready, would be pumped into the hold. In two days, or at most, in three, the strike-breakers would have restored order and resumed the suspended operations within the great building.

The revolutionists opened negotiations with the governor general. If he would suspend martial law and summary executions, business should be resumed. They sent Nikolai to him with such proposals. We went up to the palace upon the hill and were admitted to General Kaulbars, a man of sinister fame who, having failed in the Manchurian campaign, had been sent back to shoot down men of his own nation that aspired to freedom.

Kaulbars was seated at the table of his office in uniform. He heard Nikolai in scornful silence, fiddling with his black beard and twining his long fingers round each other nervously.

"You tell me that unless I suspend martial law you will blow up the Caspian," he said suavely. He seemed to think for a moment, then pressed a bell upon his table twice. Instantly a pair of armed guards appeared at the door, their rifles turned full upon Nikolai and myself.

"Take these men out and hang them in the courtyard," he said.

Hitherto Nikolai had spoken in the vulgar Russian of the laboring man. Now, without a sign of trepidation, he addressed Kaulbars in his own dialect.

"I wouldn't do that," he said persuasively.

"Why not?" demanded Kaulbars, starting from his seat in astonishment.

"Because his majesty would be annoyed with you," said Nikolai; and, unpinning his lapel, he exposed to the general's view the insignia of the Black Hundred, that murderous organization very close to the emperor's heart.

Kaulbars signed to the soldiers to depart. "Who are you?" he stammered. "Why did you come to me with threats?"

"General," said Nikolai, "you failed to hear me patiently. I did not threaten to blow up the Caspian. I was repeating to you the absurd threats of the Nihilists. I came to assure you that I can lay my hands upon the inner council; I know where they meet and what they plan."

Kaulbars started to his feet excitedly. "I will lead a battalion there," he cried. "At once!"

"It is not so easy as that," Nikolai responded. "The house is fortified; they have three pieces of artillery, which they brought in, in oil drums. And there are two hundred men with Mausers and Browning pistols. Why, general, the town is full of American correspondents, and since his majesty was mistakenly persuaded into relaxing the censorship of the press, they would telegraph to their papers that civil war has broken out. How would that affect your interests?"

The general sank back into his chair. "But I must have them," he muttered, wiping the sweat from his brow. "What shall I do?"

"Give me six men tomorrow evening," said Nikolai. "Let them meet me at the corner of Presbykoff street, with picks and shovels. That is all I require to exterminate revolution in Batoum."

And he went on to expound his scheme. As Kaulbars listened I saw the sweat start out upon his face again; I could not understand the words Nikolai uttered, but I could see that Kaulbars was badly terrified. At last he stood up.

"I agree," he said. "But, one of the six goes armed. And, at the first sign of treachery, he will shoot you. You see," he went on apologetically, "these cursed Nihilists have taken to forging badges of the Black Hundred now, and it is my duty to be on guard against every man. Curse this appointment! I wish I were back in St. Petersburg. Yes, one of the six goes armed. And I shall be that, Captain—?"

"Skobeloff," said Nikolai with a bow; and then we left him.

When we were back in our quarters Nikolai explained his scheme to me.

"I told the governor general," he said, "that the Nihilists, working as employes of the city council, have succeeded in laying a dynamite mine under the palace, controlled by an electric wire which runs from their headquarters in the suburbs, a mile away. Of course he wanted to dig it up. I represented that such an attempt would have disastrous results, and propounded an alternative scheme. The other end of the wire, I explained, runs into their arsenal. By disconnecting the wire mid-way, and establishing a miniature battery underground the current can be reversed and sent into the revolutionists' headquarters, where an accomplice will have affixed a side-wire running into the revolutionists' cordite store. One touch of a button, and the fort goes into the air. Picture the general's joy! I found by a few judicious questions, that he knows nothing at all of electricity. He is too terrified to remain in the palace, so he himself will take charge of the party of excavators; and at the first sign of treachery, he will shoot. I told him that it might be necessary to destroy a few harmless people in blowing up the fort. 'Burn the whole cursed town, if you want to,' he answered. So there you are, Summers."

Then from a desk he drew a large sheet of blue paper, which he spread out on the table in front of him.

"Do you know what this is?" he asked.

I saw a multitude of white and red lines traced upon it, but their meaning was incomprehensible to me.

"This," said Nikolai, "is a map of the underground city of Batoum. It is the only complete map in existence, although, of course, it exists in sections. The sewers are known to the sewage department, for instance, and the gas mains to the gas companies. It was prepared for the inner section by one of the city engineers. It is very useful to know what one is living over.

"Here," he continued, tracing his finger along a series of thick, white lines, "are the sewers, which come to the surface in the suburbs as open ditches. Here are the gas mains—not many of them as yet." He pointed to a broad ribbon of red which shot into the map from without and divided into several branches, all terminating in parallel lines along the waterfront. "What do you suppose these to be?" he asked.

I shook my head.

"That is the underground pipe line. It runs from the oil gushers toward the mountains through the city, taps some local gushers, and connects with the terminal refineries. The crude oil is there converted into the commercial product, and loaded upon the ships—or, in our case, pumped through a submarine pipe into the hold of the Caspian. Now do you begin to glimpse my plan?"

"I understand that you are to blow up some buildings with dynamite, which the governor general will think are strongholds of the Nihilists," I answered. "But what that has to do with the pipe line, or how you will blow up the Caspian, is still a puzzle to me."

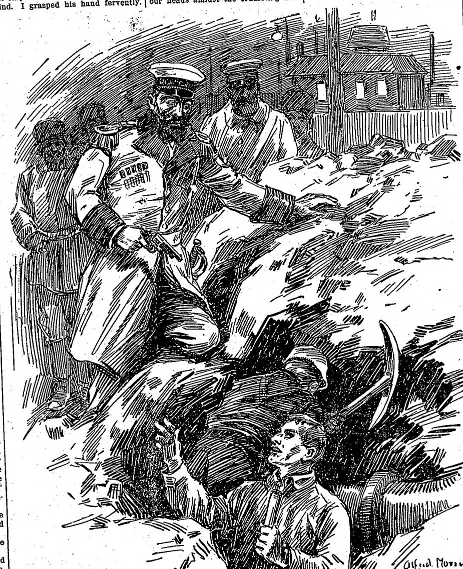
"You are very slow at deduction," said Nikolai impatiently. "Now let me explain fully. We are not going to set off any dynamite. There exists no dynamite, outside the brain of Kaulbars. What we shall do is this: Tomorrow night we meet him and his excavators at the appointed spot and lead them out to here." He put his finger down upon a part of the map. "Here the oil pipeline and the main gas-pipe cross one another—although the fact is probably unknown to both the oil and the gas companies. Here the oil pipe-line swings around for the refineries, and, ten feet immediately below, is the gas main.

Here we pretend to dig for the electric wire which supposedly connects with the dynamite store. Kaulbars will not get down into the mud, and his soldiers will obey my orders without understanding or questioning. We take with us some lengths of rubber hose. We cut a hole in either pipe and switch off the flow. The oil, diverted from its natural channel, streams through the gas main. The gas, choked off by the oil, flows into the oil pipe, which is temporarily emptied. The result?"

"The oil pours through all the branches of the gas main, into every home, comes into contact with the light, and sets fire to the city," I cried.

"Precisely. But since only the officers and police have gas in their homes, the poor will not suffer. And the gas, rushing through the oil pipe into the refineries, comes into contact with the lights and explodes with terrific violence; moreover, it passes straight through the pipe-line beneath the water into the hold of the Caspian and the work of the revolutionary party is accomplished."

He looked at me triumphantly, and I saw, not the horror of the scheme, with its attendant holocaust of lives, but only the master-plan of a master-mind. I grasped his hand fervently.



I SAW THE REVOLVER TREMBLE IN HIS HAND.

"It is the plan of a genius," I exclaimed.

Kaulbars and his men were already upon the spot when we arrived at the corner of Presbykoff street upon the following evening. The general was dressed as a captain of sappers. Behind him his six men stood at attention.

"It is something of a tramp," said Nikolai, as he greeted him. "If you will follow us—"

"I shall accompany you," said Kaulbars grimly. "And if you play us false, Captain Skobeloff—" He hesitated and looked back. Two men sprang forward and grasped me; two more grasped my companion.

"Search them," said the governor general.

We were neither of us armed. When this became patent to Kaulbars, he apologized with some uneasiness.

"The truth is, Captain Skobeloff," he said to Nikolai, "I am really at my wits' end, surrounded as I am by spies and traitors. I confess that I have had suspicions of you. There are four Captain Skobeloffs in the army list; but three are stationed in Moscow and one is upon special duty in Vienna."

"I am he," Nikolai answered, and began to speak of men at the emperor's court. Kaulbars had been an attache there. The last vestige of suspicion disappeared.

"And now let us set out," said Nikolai; and he led us through the deserted streets, with their patrols at every corner, who challenged us and received the pass-word from the governor general. At last we emerged into a wilderness of building lots, a desolate district among the oil fields, where the rank autumn growth struggled against the black ash from the refineries that lay thickly over all. Nikolai stopped at a small post which indicated the turn of the subterranean oil-pipe.

"Here is the most suitable place," he said in a low voice. "You have the battery, Summers?"

I drew the two dry cells which I had brought from my overcoat pocket. Kaulbars looked at them suspiciously.

"For generating the current," Nikolai explained. "Two cells are sufficient to detonate the arsenal. My confederate has run the wire into the center of a heap of loose cordite. No, these are not bombs, General. See!"

He let them fall into the grass, then picked them up and stood them against the post. "Now to work," he said, and snatched a pick from the nearest soldier. I took another, and we began to break up the ground, while Kaulbars, buttoning his military overcoat tightly around him, seated himself upon the grass and watched the operations with some interest. At our command the soldiers fell to work, and soon a large hole had been excavated. Then we set to with the spades, leaped into the excavation, and shoveled until we could hardly throw up the earth to the edge of the pit. At last the picks chinked.

"That's the gas main," whispered Nikolai. "We must have missed the pipe. Widen the hole!" he directed the soldiers, and the excavation began to spread out in all directions, until all at once an immense earthen pipe, of wide dimensions, appeared above our heads amidst the crumbling soil.

Nikolai unfastened his coat and, from his waist, took a length of rubber hose, tough but flexible; it was a marvel to me how he had worn it. Kaulbars sprang to his feet.

"What is that?" he cried, bending into the darkness.

"The electric conductor," Nikolai answered briskly. "Now, general, will you throw down the dry cells to me?"

Rather distastefully, Kaulbars picked up the cells and dropped them upon Nikolai's shoulders. They tumbled down into the pit.

"In ten minutes, general," said he, "you will see the conspirators' stronghold leap into the air. It may be that some near-by building will fall—"

"Let the whole town burn," responded Kaulbars savagely, stamping his feet to warm them against the frosty air.

The soldiers, leaning upon their implements, looked to Nikolai for instructions.

"This is ticklish work," he called to Kaulbars. "Let your men step out of the pit."

The general called them and they clambered up the yielding sides, leaving Nikolai and myself alone.

He drew the rubber hose close, tied one end, and held the other against the pipe. Very carefully I chinked my pick against it. A chip flew, another; I struck more strongly and the pipe split. Instantly a stench of escaping gas filled the air. With all his force Nikolai thrust the end of the hose into the orifice.

"What are you doing?" cried Kaulbars in alarm.

"Burned out a carbon fuse," called Nikolai. "Now for the oil-pipe line, Summers."

We clung to the sides of the pit and renewed our toil. This pipe was stronger, however, and it required a violent effort to break it. A large, irregular hole suddenly appeared, and a sudden rush of oil drenched us to the skin.

The fluid was spurting under the force of the pumps. For a moment we could make no headway. It bathed us, running down our clothes, twisting us round; we clung to the hose, which writhed and spun in our hands like an enormous snake. At last, with a final effort, we thrust it into the orifice. A little jet of oil spurted beside it, but meager in comparison with what we had dammed back.

"How long," cried Kaulbars in an agitated voice. He was becoming nervous. I saw the revolver tremble in his hand as it was turned, now upon Nikolai, now upon myself. Nikolai scrambled out of the pit, I followed, and we stood, dripping with oil, two hardly human figures, in front of the governor general.

"It is finished!" said Nikolai slowly.

A cry came from one of the soldiers. I spun round and followed the line of his outstretched finger. Batoum had suddenly grown dark. The palace, twinkling with its thousand lights upon the hill, the brilliantly illumined quarters of the officers, the light upon the sea, the lights of the harbor front, the red glare from the refineries—all had vanished, leaving us alone among a world of shadows.

Kaulbars uttered a terrible cry and leveled his pistol at Nikolai's head. I struck up his arm; there was a report, and the bullet went high above our heads. The governor general stood irresolute and trembling; his soldiers, their leader having issued no command, wavered also.

"Look!" shouted Nikolai.

A stream of light sprang into the sky; another, and another. From every refinery chimney came a leaping tongue of ruddy flame; the palace glowed again; the quarters of the officers hung out broad banners of fire. It rose into the air, this universal light, in twisting spirals that locked and interlaced, like streamers of the Northern Lights. And all along the harbor front the fires sprang into life, passing from dock to dock. Only upon the waters the shadows brooded. Then, as we watched, we heard a muffled, distant roar, and a volcano of flame seemed to spring from the bed of the sea; columns of fire shot upward, and a dense pall of smoke, following them, hid everything from view, in a blackness deeper than that of night, though rent here and there by the red streamers that quivered at its heart.

The Caspian had been strewn, smaller than shingles, on the breast of the waters. And with it, two parts of the city of Batoum had disappeared.

Nikolai touched me on the sleeve. Kaulbars had dropped his weapon and stood nodding and smiling at the flames. Fear seemed to have unhinged his mind, and he regarded the destruction of his palace as the end of his term of exile in the Caucasus. Whether he suspected Nikolai of this work or believed that he had merely failed to frustrate the revolutionists' design we never knew. We backed slowly away; then, seeing that Kaulbars still made no signal, we strode off through the bewildered soldiers. They called and moved after us; we walked away faster; while they waited, a wave of darkness rushed toward us across the fields, composed of stinging particles of ashes and soot. It enveloped us; hand in hand we groped our way through the distracted city to safety.

CHINESE OF THE OCCIDENT

Men of Business Are the Ideal of Both United States and New Republic.

The soldier is, relatively speaking, unimportant in American life. As compared to other countries and other times, even our statesmen, with the possible exception of our presidents, are not held first in our estimation. In spite of all convictions under the Sherman law and the many disclosures of business lobbies, a "successful business man" comes near to being our national ideal.

We are beginning even to utilize business in fiction in a way that previous generations have not done. Always there have been "business men" in literature. Shakespeare wrote of Antonio and Shylock, but it was not the technique of their business that he chose to portray. To glorify merchandising and to put in a novel the science of salesmanship is a thing that is probably peculiar to this age. Neither soldier, sailor, poet nor politician is looked upon with such regard as the American business man.

And this should have its good effect. The more esteemed a calling the better its standards. A nation that looks up to its industrial leader puts a premium upon making business a high calling. Already at least two colleges, Harvard and Dartmouth, have business schools, not so much to teach the student business practice as to give him a broad business vision and a high business standard, such an attitude toward his calling as is common among the professions that require special training.

In a way we are becoming the Chinese of the occidental world, says the World's Work. We are doing now what they have done for centuries, glorifying the merchant and neglecting the soldier who with us for centuries past in fact and in fiction has been the dominant man of our national ideals.

"STUPID VICE OF SWEARING"

Magazine Explains Why It Has Practically Been Barred From Its Pages.

For two months I was printer's devil for the proprietor of the Valparaiso Vidette. I learned to set type and makeup the paper, but what I most remember was learning to swear. Profanity was then the accepted etiquette about a country newspaper office. The oaths meant nothing. They were not even ingenious or amusing, and they were not indicative of strong feeling. It was simply an ugly habit like tobacco chewing—which I got to hate there because the loafers in the office used to spit on the floor about the type cases, from which I often had to pick up type. I soon became expert in profanity myself, and could scarcely utter a sentence without an oath. When I got over the habit of swearing, I got over it entirely. Ever since it has seemed to me a vice as stupid as it is ugly.

I have always been against using profane expressions in McClure's Magazine, except where the author could convince me that they were absolutely necessary for the truthful portrayal of character—and then the author had to be some one who knew what he was talking about.—McClure's Magazine.

Scant Praise to the "Good Losers."

Maj. M. M. Beck thinks too much credit is given to a "good loser." "A man," he says, "fighting for a principle should never be a 'good loser.' The men who for years unsuccessfully fought slavery in this country, in congress and on the rostrum, were not 'good losers.' They suffered defeat after defeat and yet always came back. The same may be said of the men and women who have been fighting the liquor traffic. Defeat has only made them more zealous and determined. General Grant was not a 'good loser.' At Pittsburgh Landing and in the battles against Lee on the way to Richmond reverses and seeming defeat only nerved him for more determined efforts. General Thomas would never have won or deserved the cognomen of the Rock of Chickamauga if he had been a 'good loser.' Colonel Roosevelt has none of the earmarks of a 'good loser' in the fight he has espoused for equal opportunities and better conditions for the common people of this land of the free."—Kansas City Star.

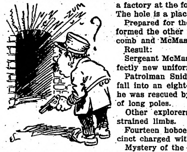
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Queer Noises End When Hoboes Are Arrested

CLEVELAND, O.—For six long weeks police of the second precinct station, Oregon avenue Northeast and East Twenty-fourth street, had been trying to solve the mystery of queer noises that came from the "hole in the wall" of a factory at the foot of East Thirty-seventh street. The hole is a place where cinders are cooled.



Prepared for the worst, an exploring party was formed the other night, headed by Sergeants Holcomb and McMasters.

Result:

Sergeant McMasters, bruised and loser of a perfectly new uniform.

Patrolman Snider recovering from effects of a fall into an eight-foot tank of water, from which he was rescued by his fellow officers with the aid of long poles.

Other explorers suffering from bruises and strained limbs.

Fourteen hoboes locked up in the second precinct charged with vagrancy.

Mystery of the "hole in the wall" solved. Queer noises were results of hoboes' snoring.

It was nine o'clock at night when the party arrived at the "hole in the wall." Halt was called by the sergeants, and the party went into conference. It was decided to surround the place and let Sergeant McMasters, the thinnest of the party, climb through the hole.

While McMasters continued scrambling, Patrolman Snider, stranger to the place, went on a little trip of his own. He fell into a tank of lukewarm water.

His cries for help were heard by other members of the party, who managed to fish him out of the tank. He was taken to the station in the emergency auto. While attention was directed to the saving of Patrolman Snider hoboes in a long line began filing out of the place.

Sergeant Holcomb discovered them escaping. With three other officers he managed to corral 14 of them.

Confusion of Tongues, Garments, and Parents

NEW YORK.—The wisdom of parents who know their own children was sadly lacking on the part of one mother on Ellis island the other day. On that account, had it not been for his acute perception and his persistence, Abraham Blaz, two and a half years old, might now be Miss Josepha Lasich, two years old, so far as records are concerned.

Abraham and his mother arrived a few days ago from Warsaw, Russia, and his first step toward American citizenship was to acquire that inevitable American infantile malady—measles. The measles hindered his progress somewhat, for he was sent to the Ellis Island hospital, where he met for the first time little Josepha Lasich. Josepha's little sister was very ill, so she and her mother were detained.

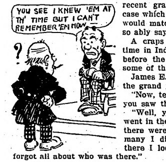
Abraham emerged from the measles unconditionally several days ago, and the physicians decided that he could resume his clothes and prepare to leave the island. At the same time little Josepha awoke and asked in her very best Croatin to be dressed. Coincidentally, something out in the bay attracted the attention of the nurses for a moment so that Abraham, reaching for a garment, picked up something belonging to Josepha before the nurses returned.

When Mrs. Blaz called to see her son and—well, she got his clothes, but the contents thereof did not seem to respond to her paternal affections with all the readiness of a week before.

A shift of clothing worked wonders both in the restoration of relatives and the joy of the mothers.

Man Was So Excited He Just Couldn't Remember

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—It is not often that the secrets of the grand jury room are bared to the public and less often are these secrets "let out" by the judge of the criminal court, but Judge Markey of the criminal court says a recent grand jury investigation of a gambling case which he attended brought out a witness who would match up well with the trust witness who so ably says: "I just can't remember about that."



YOU SEE I KNEW 'EM AT TH' TIME BUT I CAN'T REMEMBER 'EM NOW

A craps game had been going on for some time in Indiana avenue and a witness was called before the grand jury, which desired to obtain some of the names of the players.

James E. Deery, deputy prosecutor in charge of the grand jury, questioned the witness.

"Now, tell us the names of some of those men you saw there," said the prosecutor.

"Well, you know," replied the man, "when I went in there I saw about eight men I knew. But there were so many there I really can't say how many I did know. You see when I rushed in there I looked around for a minute and then I forgot all about who was there."

"Give us the names of the men you knew there."

"Well, you see, I knew them at the time, but I just can't remember their names now. You see I was so excited."

Percy Did Not Believe in the Human Eye's Power

CHICAGO.—Houston Plunkett is not much of a runner, having only one leg, but as a hypnotist he admits that he is probably the greatest the world has ever known. He made his boast in a rooming house in West Lake street a few evenings ago. It was greeted with guffaws by unbelievers. Percy Milton was one of the leaders among the faithless.

PHUTT PHUTT!

"Hypnotist! Huh!" sniffed Percy.

Houston said not a word. He advanced on the unbeliever, looked him straight in the eye and made several rapid passes with his hands, accompanying each movement with a "phfutt! phfutt!"

Percy's hilarious laugh resolved into a peaceful smile; he sank back in his chair and snored soundly.

"And now, ladies and gents," Houston announced to his open-mouthed audience, "I'll show you a trick with an overcoat."

He took Percy's overcoat from Percy's unresisting form; also his undercoat and with a series of awe-inspiring "phfutt-phfutts" and more mysterious passes he hobbled out into the street.

In Judge Dolan's court Percy described the incident in elaborate detail. He said he had slept 26 hours, and still felt "dopey." Houston had failed to produce his two coats after the magic disappearing act, he said.

Houston admitted that he pawned the garments. He said he needed 50 cents to buy a magic wand.

Both Houston and Percy are negroes.

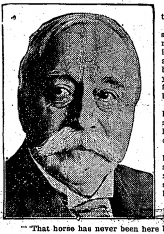
SURGEON GENERAL OF THE ARMY

Brig. Gen. George H. Torney, surgeon general of the army, says in his summary of the work done by the medical department that typhoid fever, the most formidable of all camp diseases in the past, has practically ceased to be a cause of non-effectiveness in our army.

"This, as is well known," says Gen. Torney, "is the brilliant result of the immunization of our army against this disease by the typhoid prophylactic. It was demonstrated in the maneuver camp at San Antonio in 1911 that it was entirely practicable to immunize a division upon mobilization without materially interfering with the military duties. The same can be done for any number of divisions. Thus, if at any time it becomes necessary to mobilize a large army of militia and volunteers they can be properly protected against this disease in a short time after arrival in camp."

Surgeon General Torney says that he considers this achievement in regard to typhoid fever as second only in importance to the suppression of yellow fever. The surgeon general also says that beri-beri has practically disappeared from among the Philippine islands.

JOKE ON ADMIRAL DEWEY



None likes a joke upon himself better than Admiral Dewey.

"Awhile ago I wished to purchase a riding horse," said the hero of Manila, "and on inquiry found an animal in Virginia, that home of excellent saddle horses, which, I was assured by the seller, was a thoroughbred of youth and lineage fully warranting the fancy price he was asking for the beast.

"Forthwith I purchased it, fearful lest some other horse-fancier might snap up the rare prize if I delayed in haggling over a few hundred dollars' difference between us.

"A few days after I was astride my bargain on the Conduit road, just outside of Washington, when he cast a shoe. I drew up at a blacksmith's shop, which was fortunately near, to have the damage repaired.

"'Well, well, old boy,' exclaimed the blacksmith, patting my prize familiarly, 'you back here?'

"'That horse has never been here before,' I said. 'I have just purchased him from a dealer in Virginia. He is a young thoroughbred, fresh from the fields of Fauquier county.'

"'I don't like to contradict a gentleman,' replied the blacksmith, 'but the mounted policeman on this suburban beat rode that nag for nigh on a dozen years until he was sold by the police department last spring to some o' them horse sharps down in Virginia. Them fellows can do wonders with an old plug!'"

DISAPPOINTED IN MURDOCK

© HARRIS & EWING

When Representative Victor Murdock of Kansas was a young lad he entered as a student at an academy known as the Lewis school in that state. He was one of the promising pupils and did well in his studies. But one of his classmates—Jones might have been his name—was the "bad boy" of the place and up to every bit of mischief that went on.

But years passed by. The boys who had met on the field for football and marbles had gone out into the world to meet their destiny. And Murdock had lost sight of Jones in the smoke which hung over his political contests. But Jones, though "gone," was not "forgotten." Murdock often wondered what had been the path in life of the reckless, foolhardy boy.

At last, one night, Murdock was called to a town in New Jersey to deliver a speech on some important issue and while there met an old friend of his boyhood days. They talked over old times and laughed about things over which they had once shed boyish tears.

"It's strange how the old lads have turned out," sighed the friend in a reminiscent mood. "Those who were the worst and who were expected to go to the bad have become fine men, and many of those who were model boys have gone to the bad themselves."

"For instance?" queried Murdock, with interest in his voice.

"Well, there's Charley Jones and yourself for an instance," replied the old friend. "Charley was such a dare devil that every one believed he would land in the pen—he is now a minister here in this very town. While you, whom every one thought a prize pupil, are actually going to congress!"

PURVEYOR OF ENTERTAINMENT

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

When he was assistant secretary of state, Dudley Field Malone, now collector of the port of New York, found entertaining a large portion of his job. He is a young man, and, needless to say, is Irish. His full title was third assistant secretary. There was little that the government expected from him except that he exert his natural talents as a purveyor of entertainment. When a jaded potentate or prince with a sallow, sorrowful look came to this country upon an official visit it was Secretary Malone's duty to take him firmly in hand and show him what a bright little world this is. Uncle Sam didn't worry about the expense. He cheerfully paid the bills, and only asked that the third assistant secretary make merry until the guest departed from the shores of this country.

Former Secretary Malone was one of the most successful entertainers in the government. He is possessed of one of those natures of which good humor is a natural part. They say in the state department that no man ever say Secretary Malone in a pessimistic state of mind or an untidy appearance personally.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Smart Set Woman Helped Out the Entertainment

WASHINGTON.—A smart set woman was entertaining a box party—musical comedy—Monday night. She was wholesome of figure, with a cleverly conserved throat line and one of those satisfactory heads that can stand simplicity of hair fixing. Her dress was a filmy white something all over sparkles, and there was a corsage rose—giant specimen of the millineribus makiana—that wanted to flare a vivid crimson, but thought it more stylish to smolder the latest dull red. Every woman knows.

For company there were other smart set women with more or less conserved throat lines; an exceedingly full dress man, of an age that—if Nature had her innings—ought to be doing the home circle act with slippers and cigar; another who suggested a student lamp—midnight oil variety—turned human; and a third——

The third was a youngish and distinguished smart setter who looked as if Mother Nature had said to herself while creating him: "I'll cut this one out of my Burton Holmes pattern."

But none was so discriminatingly entertaining as the woman with the satisfactory head—which shows the good material inside. To the student lamp man, who doubtless ran to brains, she was seriously interesting, and her laughably humorous banter was just the right stuff for the fat man, who anybody could see dearly loved his joke.

She opened a vanity box, looked in its mirror and dabbed some powder on her nose.

The other women who were looking and listening, and the pattern young man who was looking and talking, ignored the powder dabbing with a matter-of-courseness that implied it to be so common a proceeding as not to be worth noticing. So that was all there was to that.

At least, it would have been all if it hadn't been for the people in the orchestra, and the opposite galleries, and the standing room onliers, banked against the aisle across—and one musician who passed the good work along to his brothers of the brasses and the drums. It had been rather a long wait between curtains, and everybody in the house—always allowing for exceptions—was staring at the boxes to pass the time.

And the smart set woman accommodatingly helped them out.

Seeing It Was Only a Watch He Didn't Care

THOMAS R. SHIPP, the executive secretary of the National Conservation congress, called on President Wilson one bright morning in September to ask the president to deliver an address at the convention of the congress. While they were talking, a bell tinkled somewhere, and the president picked up the telephone receiver. No one wished to talk to him, however.

"I wonder what that was?" remarked President Wilson.

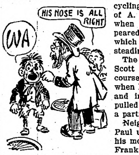
Mr. Shipp, whose face showed signs of embarrassment, pulled out a remarkable looking watch. It had devices of all sorts on it.

"I think it was this," said Mr. Shipp. "It is a watch that Colonel White of the executive committee of the conservation congress brought to me from Switzerland. It has phosphorescent hands, which may be seen in the dark. It has a device to ring the time of day or night at five-minute intervals; it has the sun, moon and stars, rising and setting; a calendar and an almanac. It also has an alarm. You see, I had this engagement with you at 10 o'clock, and set the alarm for that time. But I was ushered in a bit early. The bell went off promptly, you see."

"Seeing that is only a watch, I do not object," said the president, with a smile. "It might have been some Republican sounding the alarm."

Secretary Daniels' Sons Are Practical Boy Scouts

JONATHAN DANIELS, aged twelve, and Frank Daniels, aged ten, sons of Secretary of the Navy Daniels, are enthusiastic Boy Scouts and know all of the "first aid to the injured" operation of their guild. They were out bicycling recently with Paul Heiss, aged nine, son of A. E. Hess, a Washington newspaper man, when Nathan Scott, another nine-year-old, appeared in the distance on a new Christmas bicycle which he manipulated with a good deal of unsteadiness.



HIS NOSE IS ALL RIGHT
WA

The newcomer, a grandson of former Senator Scott of West Virginia, managed to keep his course until he got into the midst of the trio, when his machine collided with that of Jonathan, and in the resulting mix-up young Heiss was pulled along for some distance on his face across a particularly rough piece of roadway.

Neighbors rushed to the scene and picked Paul up, bathed his face and turned him over to his mother. A doctor was hastily summoned and Frank Daniels danced around excitedly suggesting various things. When the doctor appeared on the scene his first motion was toward Paul's bloody nose, as though to see if it were broken.

"Oh, doctor, that's all right," exclaimed Jonathan. "His nose is all right. We stood him up [illegible] a tree and tried that the first thing."

This Government Scientist Is Expert on Bats

THERE is an earnest and brilliant scientist in the service of the government who is an expert on bats. These bats are the kind that have the bodies of mice and the wings of pterodactyls and a prevailing weakness for flying into windows at night and butting into everything in the room.

I HAVE NO MORE SECRETS—HONEST I HAVEN'T

The name of this scientist is Dr. H. K. Fischer, and from him the bat, no matter what his species, is possessed of no secret.

It was he who dispossessed benighted public opinion of the cherished notion that bats climbed into women's hair. It is he who confidently pointed out that me should be kind to bats because bats or bird bats, or whatever they are, were handy things to have around.

Dr. Wagner is Uncle Sam's sardine expert. It is his duty to find out what becomes of the sardines. The doctor has it down to a fine science. He has studied the sardine with the same scientific yet affectionate thoroughness that Dr. Fischer has shown regarding the bat. He is one of the few men who can trace the sardine schools and high schools and colleges on their long trips twice a year. According to the doctor, the perils of the sardine are many, the chief one being the many fish which regard it as their natural prey. Dr. Wagner has been of splendid assistance to Uncle Sam in suggesting various ways for preserving and continuing the sardine, and his reforms have been heralded everywhere as distinct advances in this field of endeavor. Indeed, the doctor might be described as the man who keeps up that fine old institution, the canned sardine, as an adjunct of midnight lunch.

FEDERAL PROBES OF TWO STRIKES

CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES AT HOUGHTON, MICH., AND DENVER.

COPPER INQUIRY SUBJECTS

Seven Fields of Inquiry to Be Covered by Investigators in Calumet Region—Coal Investigations Are Being Held.

Hancock, Mich., Feb. 10.—Causes that led up to existing conditions in the Michigan copper country are being presented to the congressional investigating committee by the striking miners.

O. N. Hilton, senior counsel for the Western Federation of Miners, has charge of the testimony to be introduced before the committee by strikers. The mine owners have not publicly outlined their line of testimony beyond saying that they will produce any witnesses and all the records required by the congressional committee.

Subjects of Inquiry.

Seven subjects of inquiry are specified in the house resolutions:

Whether the postal services are interfered with.

Whether the immigration laws are being violated.

Whether citizens have been arrested and tried contrary to the constitution or laws of the United States.

Whether there exist agreements and combinations contrary to law for controlling the production, sale and transportation of copper.

Whether arms and ammunition have been shipped into the fields for the purpose of excluding the products of the mines from competitive markets in interstate trade.

Whether peonage exists, or has been maintained.

If any or all these conditions exist, what causes led up to the situation.

Denver Committee Busy.

Denver, Colo.—The congressional investigation of the Colorado coal strike began with conferences at which the sub-committee of the house committee on mines and mining met Governor F. M. Ammons of Colorado and representatives of the coal operators and the United Mine Workers of America. Taking of testimony is on in the senate chambers of the state capital.

At the conclusion of the Denver hearings the committee will go to Trinidad to investigate the strike in detail to the Colorado coal fields.

The sub-committee comprising Representatives Martin D. Foster, Illinois, chairman; James Francis Byrnes, South Carolina; John M. Evans, Montana; Richard Wilson, Austin, Tennessee, and Howard Sutherland, West Virginia, arrived in Denver yesterday morning.

THINK 50 OR MORE PERISHED

Nothing to Solve Mystery of the Awful Disaster in Cumbre Tunnel.

Cumbre, Chihuahua, Feb. 10.—Nothing but charred bones and buttons were found by the rescuing party which with the aid of oxygen helmits and pulmoters succeeded in penetrating the Cumbre tunnel from the south portal as far as the locomotive and first two cars of the passenger train.

These bones are supposed to be the remains of the engineer and fireman of the ill-fated passenger train. They were probably killed when their engine crashed into the burning freight train which had been pushed into the tunnel by Castillo's bandits several hours before.

It is now believed that everyone of the 50 or more passengers, including the crew, which were aboard the train when it dashed into the tunnel last Wednesday night, are dead. Whether the train was hurried into the tunnel to escape being captured by Castillo's bandits or sent headlong to its destruction by the bandits may never be known.

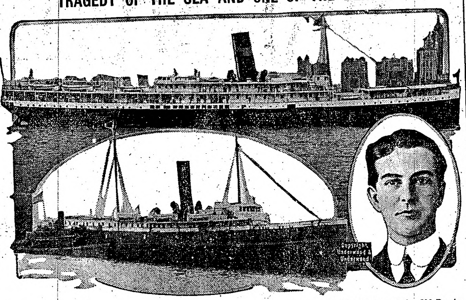
Says Baron Misrepresented His Offer.

London, Feb. 10.—The Earl of Derby has declined to sell to Baron De Forest his Bootle estate in the suburbs of Liverpool on the ground that Baron De Forest has wilfully misrepresented the terms of his offer. Baron De Forest recently cited the Bootle estate as a striking example of unearned increment. The property, which was purchased in 1724 for $35,000, he estimated to be worth between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000. Lord Derby said he would sell the estate for $7,500,000.

Charged With Wife's Death.

Newark, N. J., Feb. 10.—The police have charged Charles I. Manning with murder in connection with the slaying of his wife, Harriet, in her mother's home on Friday night. Manning had been in jail, officially not under arrest, since Saturday night. A few hours before he was taken in charge by the police, 20-year-old Hazel Herdman, who was infatuated with Manning, had died in a hospital after taking poison. It was she who shot and killed Mrs. Manning.

TRAGEDY OF THE SEA AND ONE OF THE HEROES



When the steamer Nantucket of the Merchants and Miners line ran into the Monroe of the Old Dominion line in a dense fog off the Virginia coast about two score persons lost their lives. Our illustration shows the Monroe above, the Nantucket below, and, inset, Ferdinand Kuehn, chief wireless operator of the Monroe, who gave his life belt to a woman passenger and went to the bottom with the vessel.

TO CROSS ATLANTIC IN A DAY

FAST FLYING BOAT TO BE BUILT FOR EXPERIMENT.

Would Make Trip in From 12 to 15 Hours Without Alighting—Contract for Craft Is Let.

New York, Feb. 6.—To cross the Atlantic in from 12 to 15 hours without alighting is the task set a "flying boat," for which Rodman Wanamaker has let the contract, according to correspondence published here by Allan R. Hawley, president of the Aero Club of America. In a letter to Mr. Hawley Mr. Wanamaker says that the purpose of the undertaking is to make a "purely scientific test" of aeronautics and to provide an argument for world peace so far as the success of the craft would show that dreadnoughts might be futile in the future.

While no date for the completion of the machine has been announced, work on it has been in progress for some time.

Lieut. John H. Tower, United States navy, and Lieutenant Porte, a well-known English flyer, are mentioned as the possible pilots of the craft.

GOETHALS HAS FULL SWAY

Is Given Power to Organize Canal Force—To Employ About 2,500.

Washington, Feb. 9.—Organization of the permanent force of officials and employes to operate the Panama canal has been entrusted to Colonel George W. Goethals, who will become first governor of the canal on April 1.

Under an order by President Wilson, issued at the request of Secretary Garrison, Colonel Goethals is authorized to make appointments and fix salaries, exercising his own judgment as to the force needed. It is estimated that the number of men will be about 2,500.

The only exceptions to the new governor's right of appointment are in the cases of the district judge, the district attorney and the clerk of the court, whose designation is retained in the hands of the president under the terms of the canal act.

Colonel Goethals expects to sail from Colon Wednesday for the United States.

REBELS MAY BUY WARSHIPS

They Expect to Blow Huerta's Fleet Out of the Water.

Douglas, Ariz., Feb. 9.—Statements emanating from sources friendly to Huerta, that the lifting of the embargo would do the constitutionalist cause no good because the rebels had no money, are met with assertions by Carranza agents that they not only have money enough to buy rifles by the hundreds, but that they are able to purchase warships of sufficient power to blow the federal navy out of the water.

Two warships of not less than 15,000 tons displacement each are to be purchased for operations along the Pacific coast of Mexico, according to a statement by Constitutionalist Consul Lelivier.

Train Hits Auto; 19 Hurt.

Jacksonville, Fla., Feb. 6.—Four persons seriously were injured and fifteen more were hurt here when a railroad train struck a sightseeing automobile. All the hurt are Florida residents.

Rate Case Is Up Again.

Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 9.—The Missouri railroad rate cases, in litigation many years, were started on another journey to the supreme court of the United States when Eugene E. Bull, a partner of Frank Hagerman, attorney for the 13 roads involved, left for Red Oak, Iowa, the home of Judge Smith McPherson of the federal court, to obtain the judge's signature to an appeal to the supreme court from Judge McPherson's decision. The claims amount to $24,000,000.

HUERTA'S RULE MAY BE ENDED STORTLY

RUMORS OF REVOLT IN MEXICO CITY EXCITES ALL INHABITANTS.

FELIX DIAZ BEHIND UPRISING

2,500 Police Reported Implicated in Plot—Foreign Colonies Excited and Natives Are Alarmed by the Situation.

Mexico City, Feb. 9.—With soldiers under arms surrounding the nation palace, General Huerta and his chief advisers in conclave inside, every foreign colony in excitement and reports that fighting is on in the suburbs, Mexico City expects a struggle that may end Huerta's rule.

Diaz Behind Revolt.

Behind the revolt, it is reported, stands Felix Diaz, the man who a year ago today caused the downfall of President Madero, a desperate battle in this city and Madero's subsequent assassination.

Around the arsenal where Diaz started his fight against Madero many families have been ordered to move out and on the roofs of their houses are mounted machine guns beside which Huerta's troops slept on their arms all through last night. Couriers coming into the city from Guadaloupe, a suburb four miles to the north, brought word to Huerta that the garrison there had revolted, paving the way for the entrance into the city of several thousand rebels.

All Approaches Guarded.

Federal troops immediately were rushed to Guadaloupe in armored automobiles and batteries were mounted on the hills around the suburb, commanding every approach to the capital in that direction.

The anxiety of Huerta was increased by persistent rumors that 2,500 police in the capital are armed with carbines and ready to join the rebels whenever they gain an entrance to Mexico City. All embassies and legations were apprised of the situation and there was tremendous excitement in the foreign colonies. It was believed that the vain efforts of Huerta to put down the recurrent plots against him indicate the extreme disfavor into which the dictator has fallen with the people and the present conspiracy was thought to foretell the final downfall of Huerta by disaffections within in conjunction with rebel attacks from without.

FLOOD HAVOC AGAIN NEAR

Washington, Feb. 10.—Financial starvation has halted the efforts of the National Drainage congress to guard against the recurrence of the floods which damaged the middle, western and southern states last year.

Edmund T. Perkins, president of the congress, notified Ernest F. Picknell, national director of the Red Cross society of his inability to continue operations because of lack of funds and warned the Red Cross to be "prepared to cope again in a few weeks with flood havoc such as that of last year which cost the American people nearly a thousand lives, and property to the value of $200,000,000."

Canal Wages Being Fixed.

Panama, Feb. 7.—Colonel Goethals on receipt of notification that President Wilson had signed an executive order fixing the conditions of employment in the permanent canal organization, began arranging the wage scale, which will be 25 per cent higher than in the United States for similar work. It is estimated that when the force is completed and the canal under operation the expenses will amount to $3,500,000 annually, although it is possible that this may be reduced.

DEFENDS STOCK SPECULATION

BROKER HOLDS IT TO BE OF ECONOMIC VALUE.

W. C. Van Antwerp of New York Exchange Testifies Before Senate Banking Committee.

Washington, Feb. 7.—That stock speculation is of direct economic value because it furnishes the "epitomized judgment" of countless men on the actual value of securities and establishes the prices, was the declaration of W. C. Van Antwerp, a governor of the New York stock exchange, before the senate committee on banking and currency.

Senator Bristow's demand that Mr. Van Antwerp, who appeared in opposition to the pending bill proposing federal regulation of stock exchanges explain "what useful or economic purpose" speculative training served, brought out the view of the stock brokers. The committee was told that this position would be amplified by many well-informed men before the opposition completed its case.

Mr. Van Antwerp asserted that the bill under discussion would drive customers of stock brokers to private bankers and trust companies and create an unlicensed and unrestricted market in which the public would suffer without hope of redress.

Speculation cannot be stopped by legislative action, he declared.

While Mr. Van Antwerp was discussing "bucket shops" which he declared to be an evil that the bill would promote, H. H. Boyesen of counsel for the consolidated exchange of New York, interrupted to say his clients took a similiar view and to propose a national anti-bucket shop bill.

RADIUM FAILS; BREMNER DIES.

N. J. Congressman Succumbs to Ravages of Cancer.

Baltimore, Feb. 6. — Robert Gunn Bremner, member of congress from the Seventh New Jersey district and editor of the Passaic Daily Herald, is dead of cancer after undergoing radium treatment since last December. He had been suffering from the disease for years. Mr. Bremner was 39 years old and married, but childless.

Mr. Bremner came to a sanitarium here to try the radium after physicians in this country and Europe had vainly tried to cure him. For a time the patient appeared to improve, but a few days ago he was seized with a sinking spell. From that time on Mr. Bremner steadily grew weaker, although several times he rallied in a surprising manner.

Storm Causes Wreck; 3 Dead.

Detroit, Mich., Feb. 9.—A snow and sleet storm which fell over a large portion of Michigan, is held responsible for a railroad wreck near Saginaw, which cost three lives and, in some sections, badly crippled traffic facilities. The wreck occurred during a blinding snowstorm, when a Grand Trunk freight collided with a work train a short distance south of Saginaw.

Braisted to Succeed Stokes.

Washington, Feb. 9.—Secretary Daniels has nominated Medical Inspector William C. Braisted to be surgeon general of the navy, relieving Medical Director Charles F. Stokes, whose term of four years expired yesterday.

Russia Enacts Liquor Law.

St. Petersburg, Feb. 9.—The council of the empire has adopted drastic clauses to the bill for the regulation of the sale of alcohol.

Mrs. Hartje Is Again Wed.

Las Angeles, Feb. 9.—Mrs. Mary Scot Hartje, principal in a sensational divorce suit prosecuted by her former husband, Augustus Hartje, a wealthy resident of Pittsburgh, now is the wife of Stanley Howard, son of a wealthy New York broker, whom she met though her son, Scott Hartje. The couple was married in Pasadena Feb. 4 according to announcements, and will live in that city, where the young husband will go into business. Mrs. Hartje is 40 years old. The bridegroom is said to be 22.

CANAL TOLLS WILL CAUSE HOT FIGHT

VIEWS OF PRESIDENT TO MEET OPPOSITION IN BOTH HOUSES.

DEBATE WILL BE SPIRITED

Repeal of Present Exemption Provision to Be Fought, Even in Committee.

Washington, Feb. 9.—President Wilson's expressed desire for repeal of the provision of the Panama canal act which exempts American coastwise ships from tolls, it is apparent, will precipitate spirited debate in both houses of congress when the bill to carry out the suggestion is submitted.

Move Freely Discussed.

Senators and representatives discussed the situation, but no move was made. Action probably will come first from the house interstate and foreign commerce committee, in the form of a bill to repeal the toll exemption provision.

Representative Adamson, chairman of the committee, probably will introduce the bill immediately. He is awaiting word from the president in the matter. Although the repeal is proposed in the face of a plank in the Baltimore convention of the Democratic party, the discussion of that phase of the proposed reversal of policy is not expected to be as extended as the influence of the contemplated action upon foreign relations.

Senate to Wait.

Senate Democratic leaders plan to await action in the house before taking up the president's suggestion, but the forthcoming debate on the general arbitration treaty with Great Britain, which soon is to come up in executive session, undoubtedly will provoke discussion on the subject.

That opposition to the repeal will develop in the house interstate commerce committee was indicated by Representative Knowland of California, a member of the committee, who said: "We are paying a dear price for the friendship of Great Britain, even though it may help us out in Mexico. The proposed bill will, I predict, precipitate one of the most spirited debates which has been heard in congress for years, and will provoke a free and full discussion of our present foreign policy."

Senator O'Gorman, chairman of the interoceanic canals committee, who asserted, following the announcement of President Wilson's position, that he proposed to fight against repeal of the tolls provision to the last ditch, does not anticipate any consideration of the repeal by his committee until the matter has been disposed of in the house.

Terms Exemption "Mistaken Policy."

Baltimore, Md.—President Woodrow Wilson in a letter to William L. Marbury of this city, published in the Baltimore Sun today, says that the exemption of American coastwise shipping from Panama canal tolls "constitutes a very mistaken policy from every point of view," and "benefits for the present, at any rate, only a monopoly."

LIBERTY BELL QUESTION UP

Philadelphians Petition Officials to Refuse Removal to "Frisco" Exposition.

Philadelphia, Feb. 7. — Mrs. Cora Rogers Bleakley, president general of the National Society, Daughters of the Revolution, presented to Mayor Blankenburg, a petition containing thousands of names, protesting against the removal of the Liberty Bell from Independence Hall.

Mrs. Bleakley told the mayor that among the signers of the petition were veterans of the civil war, university presidents, professors, bankers and editors.

Mayor Blankenburg is not averse to sending the Liberty Bell to San Francisco, where it is wanted for the Panama-Pacific International exposition. He said that the protests now being made should be directed at any further trip after the proposed journey to the Pacific coast.

Authority to send the bill to San Francisco rests with the city council

Alberta Town Has Bad Fire.

Banff, Alta., Feb. 9.—Fire, starting in a tailor shop here, spread to the King Edward hotel and burned out the heart of the busines section of the town. The hotel, which has been the mecca of thousands of tourists, was completely destroyed, but there was no panic and the guests all escaped. The total fire loss is placed at $150,000. It was 10 below zero when the fire broke out and persons driven from Optimism Is Still Spreading.

New York, Feb. 9.—Bradstreet's says: Optimism continues to spread, and in some lines, especially iron and steel, actual improvement keeps pace with sentiment. Withal there is sufficient irregularity, primarily traceable to unseasonable weather conditions, to act as a check rein on the general tendency toward betterment. In the forefront is the fact that trade with the larger distributors is expanding and for so early in the season it may be deemed to be encouragingly good.

THIS WOMAN'S SICKNESS

Quickly Yielded To Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Baltimore, Md.—"I am more than glad to tell what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did for me. I suffered dreadful pains and was very irregular. I became alarmed and sent for Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I took it regularly until I was without a cramp or pain and felt like another person, and it has now been six months since I took any medicine at all. I hope my little note will assist you in helping other women. I now feel perfectly well and in the best of health."—Mrs. AUGUST W. KONDNER, 1632 Hollins Street, Baltimore, Md.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from native roots and herbs, contains no narcotic or harmful drugs, and to-day holds the record of being the most successful remedy for female ills we know of, and thousands of voluntary testimonials on file in the Pinkham laboratory at Lynn, Mass., seem to prove this fact.

For thirty years it has been the standard remedy for female ills, and has restored the health of thousands of women who have been troubled with such ailments as displacements, inflammation, ulceration, tumors, irregularities, etc.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

Hiding the Worst.

"We miss President Wilson's quiet and trenchant wit sadly here at Princeton," said an instructor in Greek.

"I remember, at one of President Wilson's receptions, I complained of a man who boasted of his bad habits.

"'When a man,' said the president, 'boasts of his bad habits, you may rest assured that they're the best he has.'"

Activities of Women.

Governor Johnston of California recently appointed a board of women to assume direct control of one of the most important reformatory institutions.

Miss Florence Sanville and Fanny Cochrane, two Philadelphia women, are taking a course in agricultural economics at the University of Wisconsin.

The Countess de la Gueriviere, who was the first woman cab driver in Paris, has gone into a new venture, that of a nurse in a Paris hospital for dogs, cats and birds.

There are only 18,000,000 married women in the United States who could be divorced, and during the past year 110,000 couples have found that they were mismated.

A California woman has erected a remarkable residence for herself at the age of seventy-three. With the exception of the roof, frame and floors, the house was built entirely by her.

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal New figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The general offers Francois a home at the Chateau. The boy refuses to leave his parents, but in the end becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis' son while the former goes to America. The Marquis before leaving for America asked Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her lackeys. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill, in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis's brother Francois lures the Austrians from the hotel allowing the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants, and through him sends word to his friends of his plight. The general, Alixe and Pietro hear from Francois and plan his rescue. Francois as a guest of the Austrian governor of the castle prison inspects the interior of the wine cellar of the Zappis.

CHAPTER XVII.—Continued.

"This is the way you are to get there. In the wine-cellar of the castle, which opens from the governor's room—in old times always the room of the lord—in that wine-cellar, on the north wall, is a square block of stone projecting slightly beyond the wall. If you press the lower corner on the left-hand side, of the stone under this, the big stone above will swing out and show an opening large enough for a man to pass. Going through, you close the door by pressing the same stone, and you then will find yourself in an underground passage which leads straight half a mile through the earth to Riders' Hollow. The passage is five hundred years old and only the family of the Zappis have ever known of it. I went through it once in my boyhood with my father, and it was in perfect condition, so I believe it will be now. It was built with solidity—as one may believe, for if the old Zappis wanted it at all they wanted it in working order.

"Your part will be difficult, Francois, but I believe you can do it. You will have to get the key of the wine-cellar, or else force the lock. Can you do that? It is necessary to do it, Francois, for we cannot get on without you, and we shall from now live only to set you free. I send you something which may be useful."

Francois dropped the letter and picked up the long loaf and tore it apart. There was a file in the center. As if a powerful tonic had been infused into him he felt strength and calmness pour through him. He read the letters over and over till he had them by heart; then he concealed them carefully, with the file, in his mattress. After that he sat down and concentrated his mind with the new force working in it, on his plan.

The governor was almost certain to have him down to dinner again in two or three days; it was a pity that while he was there, all but on the spot, he could not possess himself of the key and escape. He thought over one or two plans on that basis, but they all shipwrecked on the fact that the guards were accustomed to take him back to his room at eleven, and that, failing notice from the governor, they would certainly come to find out why if they were not called. That would start the pursuit; he must have the night clear. So he unwillingly let go of the great advantage of his own presence in the governor's room, so near the scene of action, and planned otherwise. With infinite forethought, with an eye to every contingency possible to imagine, he planned, and when the notice came, two days later, that the Count von Gersdorf wished him to dine with him that night, Francois' heart leaped madly but exultantly, for he was ready.

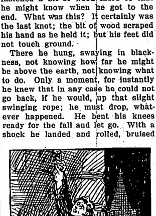
Never had the young Frenchman been more entertaining, more winning to his tyrant than tonight, but the excitement of what was before him made it almost out of the question to eat the count's dinner. As before, the count prescribed old wine as a tonic, and took Francois with him to get it. Tonight there were three bottles brought up—the count was preparing to drink hard. And Francois had some trouble in not drinking with him; but he kept up his end with singing and acting, with a dance or two out of the peasant repertoire of the Jura, with a mock drill of an awkward squad at Saint-Cyr, with clever imitations of the few people whom he had seen about the castle, Battista's gruffness and mangled German words, and the sniffling mixed with grandiloquence of one of the guards; finally he grew daring and imitated the governor's superior officer who had visited the prison six months ago and had seen Francois among the others. Francois, with his body bent out, and a fat waddle, and an improvised eye-glass and a pursy short-breathed manner, spoke of the governor severely, puffing at him between sentences, reproving him, among other things, for having prisoners dine with him.

And the governor roared with delight, for this man was his rival and it did his soul good to see him made ridiculous. He roared, and drank to the imitation, and the imitation rebuked his levity throatily, till the governor roared and drank again and shouted for more. And Francois, excited, exhilarated, did more; and still the governor drank as he acted. And the vaudeville went on. So that when the guard came at eleven the count was lying across the sofa, too tipsy to get to bed alone, and Francois had to wait, pretending to be heavy with wine himself, while the two soldiers put the governor to bed.

At last he was taken upstairs between them, leaning on them limply; at last his door clanged shut; he listened to the footsteps of the two dying away down the stone hall, down the staircase; then swiftly he drew out the file and the letters from his mattress; he hid the papers, wrapped tight in their oilskin cover, in his coat lining; he set to work with the file to finish iron bars already three-quarters filed through. That was done and with fingers that seemed to work as fast, as intelligently as his brain, he tore the bedclothes into stout strips and tied them together with square knots which would not slip, and tied knots in the line at intervals of a few feet which might keep a man's fingers from slipping. He had to guess how long the rope must be, but the bedclothes were all used and the rope was many yards—it must serve. He put the file, with two candle ends which he had saved, in his pocket; he made one end of the strip fast to an untouched iron bar of his window; he weighted the other end, then he looked about a moment, half to see if all of his small resources had been remembered, half in a glance of farewell to a place where he had passed hours never to be forgotten.

With that he vaulted to the window-ledge and took the first knot in a firm grip and let himself out into the dark still night. His feet hung in the air, his hand slid fast—fast—down that poor ladder of torn stuff; the die was cast; he was going to things unknown; he had taken a desperate chance and might not go back. And he slipped down, down, from knot to knot. Suddenly he came to the last knot; he had fastened a bit of wood there so that he might know when he got to the end. What was this? It certainly was the last knot; the bit of wood scraped his hand as he held it; but his feet did not touch ground.

There he hung, swaying in blackness, not knowing how far he might be above the earth, not knowing what to do. Only a moment, for instantly he knew that in any case he could not go back, if he would, up that slight swinging rope; he must drop, whatever happened. He bent his knees ready for the fall and let go. With a shock he landed and rolled, bruised and out of breath, but not injured; he looked up and in the dimness saw the last knot with its bit of wood swinging in air twelve feet or so from the ground.



He Must Drop, Whatever Happened.

But he had no time given him to consider this point, for at that second, at the far end of the closed yard a door opened, a blaze of light poured out, and a squad of six soldiers stepped from the castle, torches in the hands of the foremost. Francois dropped, crouching into the shadows against the wall, but his heart grew sick as he realized the futility of this. The soldiers were coming straight toward him.

With that, a gleam on a brighter surface than the ground met his sight, below the level of the ground. His eyes, searching the darkness, made out a great butt of water, sunken by the castle wall. Instantly he slid into it, up to his neck. It was not quite full, and his head did not show in the shadows of the inside. The blaze of the torches swept close, brighter, as Francois, shivering in the cold water, glued himself to the dark side; the blaze of the torches waved, shadowy, gigantic, across the water and the castle wall; he heard the soldiers speak in short deep words; it was like an evil dream, and it slipped past, torches and dark-swinging shadows and heavy tread of men and stern voices, like a dream. The heavy door shut, the lights were gone, everything was still.

More dead than alive, Francois dripped from the water-butt. The hardest part of his night's job, the part that needed all his strength of body and brain, was immediately before him, and he stood nerveless, with clicking teeth, as limp as the traditional drowned rat. A moment he stood so, utterly discouraged, without confidence, without hope. Then with his trembling lips he framed words, words familiar to him for years, and with that, in a shock, he felt strength and courage rising in him like a slow calm flood. It was not less a miracle because there was no sign in the heavens, no earthquake or lightning; it was not less a miracle because many people living now might tell of a like help in fearful need. As it was once a long time ago, the water of his blood was changed into wine. So the prisoner stood in the courtyard in the blackness of midnight and found himself ready.

He groped his way to the shed he had seen from the governor's window; with his old boyish agility he scrambled up its sloping roof and felt for the coping he had noticed—the coping wide enough for a man's foot; he had found it; he had found a water pipe above to help him stand on it; he was on the coping, face flat to the wall, working his way with infinite delicate care to the window of the governor. He never knew how long that part took; it seemed a great while, though not many feet lay between the shed and the window. Then he felt the stone sill of the window; his hand crept up; it was open—wide open. With a strong pull he had swung himself over and stood in the dark, in the governor's bedroom.

Stood and listened, hardly daring for the first instant to draw the long breath he sorely needed. Then he smiled. No necessity for that caution at least. The governor was snoring a heavy aggressive snore which would have drowned most noises. Francois stood quiet till his eyes had grown accustomed to the shadows, and then they searched about quickly. Ah! there they were, the governor's clothes. On a chair by his bed. With wary steps he stole across. He lifted off one or two things and suddenly there was a jingle.

"Ah!" growled the governor and flung out his hand, and the snore came to a full stop.

The hand searched the darkness a second; all but touched that of Francois, then fell limply, the head turned away, with a deep sigh. Like a statue Francois stood, frozen to the floor, and dared not look at the figure stirring in the bed, for fear his gaze might awake the sleeper. For he slept; the sound of the keys had only jarred some chord in his uneasy dream. Long minutes after the snoring was in full progress again Francois waited, and then with careful fingers he clasped the entire bunch of keys softly and carried them into the next room.

There was a low light there, on the writing-table. Francois slipped the thin, old, brass key which he knew off from the bunch; he glanced about quickly and found the flint and steel on its table and put them in his pocket; he took down that small saber, with its well-polished scabbard, and buckled it about himself; then a thought came to him. A sheet of paper lay on the governor's writing-table as if he had been about to write a letter; pen and ink were ready. The prisoner dropped into the governor's chair and wrote:

"My dear count, I cannot run away without leaving a good-by for you and a word of thanks for the kindness you have shown me. Be sure I shall not forget our evenings together and shall be glad when I hear of your promotion, as I am sure I shall hear. I heartily hope I am not going to make trouble for you. But I have to go—you will understand that. With a thousand thanks again I am, count, your grateful prisoner—Francois Beaupre."

Still the count snored. Francois, alert, stood and listened as he folded the note carefully and laid it under a weight on the table. Then he tempted Providence no longer. He slid the battered, bright, old, brass key softly into the lock, let himself into the dark stairway, relocked the door on the inside, groped his way painfully down the steep stairs into the wine-cellar, and when he felt a level floor under his feet struck a light with the governor's flint and steel. He lighted one of his candle ends. The wine-cellar, which he had left only two hours before, seemed almost homelike; it lacked the governor, that was all. He crossed to the projecting stone in the north wall, and pressed the corner of the stone below. Nothing happened. Hurriedly he pressed it again, harder, but the cold even surface of the wall stared him blankly in the face. Again he pushed—with no result. A sickness came over him. Was all his labor and peril to go for nothing? Was he to be caught again and thrust back, this time into some far worse dungeon? How had he dared to hope! The entrance was closed, overgrown, the masonry had grown solid with years and dampness.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Peasant Guide.

He flashed out the saber and desperately he slid it this way and that about the great stone, trying to find a crack, something to loosen, something that would give. And while he worked in a fever, in a chill, he remembered Pietro's letter.

Then he set down the candle end on a shelf and with trembling fingers drew off his coat and drew out the hidden papers. The wet from his bath in the water-butt had stained them a little, but only a little, for they were carefully wrapped in the bit of oilskin in which they had come. He unfolded the letter.

"If you will press the lower corner on the left-hand side," Pietro said—"the lower corner!"

And he had been concentrating all his efforts, all his despair, on the upper corner. When it is a question of life and death a man is superhumanly strong and quick sometimes, but he is also sometimes forgetful. It is an exciting and confusing thing, likely, to be working for life and liberty after five years of imprisonment. Francois pushed the lower left-hand corner and like magic the great block above swung out. With his lighted candle end in his hand he slipped through and turned and swung back the door into place and turned again and faced blackness. Narrow, low, cold blackness. Quickly enough, however, with good courage, with his heart thumping out a song of hope, which he had kept down sternly till now, he walked, at times stooping low as he must because of the descent, down the secret road of the old Zappis. His candle held forward, he could see a few feet ahead, but all he could see was huge blocks of rough stone, green with mold, water dripping between them. The air he breathed was heavy and thick; through his wet clothes he felt a chill as of the grave. But what mattered the road, when the road led to freedom?

Suddenly it came to him that the passage might be blocked. It was years since Pietro had been through it; some of the stones might have fallen—it would take very little to close so narrow a way. With an anxiety which was physical pain, with breathless eagerness now, he hurried on. He had to stop to light his second candle; again he hurried on. Would the end never come? Was any mistake possible? With that he stumbled against something and fell, and the candle flew from his hand and was put out; with a hoarse groan he threw out an arm to steady himself, to rise; his hand went through a yielding, prickly mass; a glimmer came in past it—light—the end!

Pushing, crashing, staggering through, he came into a strange place. It was as if a giant had taken a huge spoon and scooped out the top of the earth deep, very deep. All of this great hollow was filled with trees and tangled undergrowth. It was full of vague shadows in the glimmer of the earliest dawn. Francois, standing there sobbing, ghastly with paleness, with matted hair and wild-staring eyes and gasping mouth and wet torn clothes, was a fit demon for the haunted spot. He saw nothing, no one; with that there was a soft snapping of twigs and a movement in the darkness farthest from him; a movement toward him. Tottering he crawled to meet it; in another second the shadows had shaped into figures—a peasant boy on a horse, leading another horse.

Then he stood close to them, and the boy, leaning over without a word put something into his hand, and Francois, swaying with exhaustion, saw that it was a flask. He took a long swallow of cognac and his chilled blood leaped, and with that he had caught the bridle from the lad and was in the saddle.

In the shadows of trees, in a lonely lane, the peasant boy stopped his horse suddenly and made a short gesture toward the flask sticking out of Francois' coat pocket. His strength was going again; it was exactly the right moment. Another swallow of brandy and he rode on with fresh courage. But something in the gesture of the peasant boy; something about his seat in the saddle, about the touch of his hands on the rein, gave Francois a curious undefined shock. In the growing daylight he turned toward the silent rider. The coat collar was up and the broad-brimmed soft hat drawn down. The slim figure, outlined against the cool-pink vastness of the morning sky was clad like an ordinary young peasant—yet! There was a poise, sure grace, which seemed unlike a peasant, which seemed like—

"Have we far to go?" Francois demanded suddenly in French.

The head turned swiftly; black exaggerated lashes lifted and under them were the blue eyes he knew.

"Alixe."

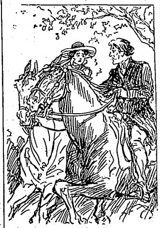
He cried it out loud, reckless, forgetting everything. But she did not forget. In an instant her hand was on his mouth, and she was whispering in terror.

"Francois, dear Francois, be careful. We are not safe yet. We have a village to ride through—see, there is a house. It is almost time for them to be awake. Ride fast. It is two miles yet."

They were racing again over the soft ground, the horses' unshod feet making little noise, and Francois' heart was playing mad music. No need now of cognac. Then they were galloping down the sand of a lonely beach, and with that there was a little group of people and a boat drawn up; and they had pulled in the horses, and Francois felt himself lifted off like a child and lying like a very little, worn-out child in the general's arms; and the general was crying, swearing, hugging him without shame. Pietro was there; Pietro was rubbing the thin hands in a futile useless sort of way, and holding them by turns to his face. Alixe, her peasant hat off now, bent over them, lovelier than ever before, not minding her boy's dress, and smiled at him, wordless. There was a huge man also who took the horses, and Francois wondered if he had heard aright that Alixe called him "little Battista." Wondering very much at everything, the voices grew far away and the faces uncertain, and he decided that it was without doubt a dream and that Battista would unlock the door shortly and bring in his breakfast. And with that he knew nothing more till he awoke in a boat.

And it was with a new feeling; with a desire and a hope to live. Pietro sat watching him and brought him warm milk and held his head up as he drank it, like a woman. Then, in quiet, slow tones, he explained all the puzzle which Francois had by now begun to wonder over. It seemed that just before little Battista had brought Francois' letter to Vicques, Pietro had received another unexpected letter, from a Colonel Hampton in Virginia, whose estate lay next the six thousand acres of land which the Marquis Zappi had bought fifteen years before. Colonel Hampton wrote with two requests. The first was that the Marquis Zappi should come to Virginia, or send some one with authority to look after his property. The land was going to rack and ruin for want of management; the uncontrolled slaves on the place were demoralizing to the neighborhood. Colonel Hampton had done what he could, but he had not the power of a master, and moreover he he was busy with his own large estate. The marquis should come or send a qualified agent at once.

The next object of the letter was to ask that the marquis should receive and entertain the nephew of Colonel Hampton, Mr. Henry Hampton, who, sailing on Colonel Hampton's ship, the Lovely Lucy, would bring this letter to the marquis. The ship would go first to England and discharge there her cargo of tobacco, and after that it was to be at the service of young Mr. Hampton, to visit such countries of Europe as he might choose, for six months. Mr. Hampton had many letters to people in England, but none elsewhere, and Colonel Hampton would be obliged if the marquis would receive him at his estate of Castelforte and let him see something of Italy from that point of vantage. The marquis might then, if he thought good, return to Virginia in the Lovely Lucy, and either set matters on a firm enough footing to be left, or else—which the colonel considered the better plan—stay with them and become a country gentleman of Virginia. The colonel had heard that there had been political trouble in Italy, but hoped that at this time the country was at peace and the marquis comfortably established in his own castle.



He Cried It Out Loud, Reckless.

All this the young marquis, an exile of five years from his native land, had read at the chateau of Vicques. He had considered deeply as to what he might do about Carnifax, his estate in Virginia. He could not go himself, for he was in close connection with the work of Italian patriots outside and inside of Italy; with Mazzini in London; with others in other places. And he did not know anyone whom he could send.

So the matter stood when the big little Battista had brought Francois' letter to Vicques. And when Alixe had appealed to him to take Francois' liberation on his shoulders, with the thought of the secret passage and the vaguely outlined plan of escape had come to him the recollection of Colonel Hampton's letter and the long sea voyage to Virginia.

So when Mr. Henry Hampton landed at Calais, a tall and very handsome and very silent young man took quiet possession of him and told him that he was the Marquis Zappi and that Mr. Hampton was to go with him to the chateau of Vicques in the Jura. There was a certain gentle force about this young marquis which made opposition to his expressed wish something like banging one's head against a stone wall. Mr. Henry Hampton had planned going direct to Paris, but he went to Vicques. And on the journey down the Marquis Zappi opened out a plan which richly rewarded him for his pliability. Mr. Hampton had somewhat clearer ideas on Italian politics than his uncle; he knew enough to detest the Austrians and to have a keen sympathy for the long, horoic, losing fight—so far losing—of those devoted men who were counting their lives as nothing for a united Italy. The scheme of helping to rescue a prisoner out of an Austrian fortress was an adventure such as made his eyes dance. Mr. Hampton was twenty-one and full of romance, romance as yet ungratified. So, Pietro told Francois, this long explanation over, the Lovely Lucy was anchored at an unimportant island outside the port for which they were bound, and Francois and the others were to go on board and set sail promptly for some port of France. There the general, Alixe, Pietro and little Battista were to be put ashore, and Francois was to sail across to Virginia with Mr. Hampton and take possession for Pietro of his American estates.

Francois, lying in bed with his eyes glowing like lanterns, listened. But as his friend finished he broke out, with a sharp pain in his voice.

"Pietro! I want to see my mother."

And Pietro was silent, laying a quiet hand over the unsteady one. Without a word he sat so and let the sick man think. The line of red which came into the pale cheeks told that he was thinking intensely, and at last, with a shivering sigh which went to the other's heart:

"You are right, Pietro," he said. "It is a wonderful plan for a broken man. It is like you to do everything right without a word said. The sea voyage, the healthy life in Virginia—that ought to make a man of me again soon, ought it not, Pietro?"

Pietro could not speak as he looked at the wrecked figure, but he nodded cheerfully.

"As for your place, I'll have that in order in a month, and in a year it will be a model for Virginia; and then I'll come home."

Pietro smiled.

"Come home and fight for the prince—for our Prince Louis. Do you remember that afternoon at the chauteau, Pietro, and the strange boy, and how he fascinated us and how—" the weak voice stopped at every syllable, but slipped on again cheerfully. The familiar charm of the boy Francois was strong as he talked. "And how he was not to be frightened by any danger of an old wall—" and Francois stopped, smiling.

"And how you saved him," Pietro added.

"That was a chance," said Francois quickly. "But, Pietro, do you remember how Alixe turned on you, because I had done it? Droll little Alixe!"

"She always scorned me because I was not wonderful like you, Francois. You were always the hero," Pietro said gently, and pressed the skeleton hand under his own.

Francois' eyes blazed up at him then as they had done so often in boyhood. "Not that, Pietro. You do not understand. It was because Alixe wished always to see you first. I was older and had a certain quickness—she wanted you to have my poor facility as well as all of your own gifts."

Pietro smiled his kind quiet smile. "My Francois, I have no gifts. And if Alixe is more proud of you it is right, for you are a pride to all of us and I am the last to grudge one particle of honor or love to you. Francois"—Pietro's deep voice stopped, and then he went on in his straightforward, simple way—"Francois, it is not possible for me to tell you how glad I am to have you, my brother, back from the dead."

And weak, nerve-wrecked Francois, holding tight to Pietro's hand, turned his face to the wall and cried.

Now that the end of effort was over, the strain of the long years showed their effects in a collapse; the stretched chord had fallen loose, relaxed as if it might never make music again. When the time came to leave the sailboat of Luigi and go aboard the Lovely Lucy, the effort was too much for the man who, two nights before, had shown the nerve and agility of an acrobat. When he must leave the boat and make the change, he fainted, and, wrapped in a blanket, ghastly white, unconscious, the little Battista carried his light weight up the ladder of the American ship.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

WHO DID HE REPRESENT?

We have refrained from making any editorial comment on candidates for the legislature up to this time, but we consider that it is a duty that we owe our subscribers to put some of the facts before them of the way our representatives have looked after their interest in the past, and then let them be their own judge, as to whether they should support them again for the same office.

There is no use to go over that long story again, about the loss of that Normal School, but we all know that Thief River Falls lost it. Now what we would like to ask Mr. O'Neill is this; When you had that Normal School in your vest pocket, how did it happen that you got your finger and thumb into the wrong pocket, and handed the slip to Bemidji instead of Thief River Falls? Of course there were other men in Thief River Falls that were to blame for this loss to that city and this territory, but they lay the blame onto Mr. O'Neill because he was so confident of getting it, that they did not make any fight for it, and the next thing we heard was that the school was located at Bemidji, and that O'Neill would make the address at the laying of the corner stone. How about this? Please arise and explain.

A LITTLE HISTORY OF THE PAST

While the editor of this newspaper was in Thief River Falls for a few hours last Saturday he learned enough of the public sentiment to convince him that good old Dan O'Neill is going to round out his legislative career as a member of the senate, despite the opposition of a vigorous young banker.—Bemidji Sentinel,Feb.6, 1914.

It would be appropriate to have D. P. O'Neill at Thief River Falls deliver the speech at the laying of the cornerstone for the Bemidji normal school,—The Bemidji Sentinel. June 13th, 1913

We think you could get him to do it alright as Bemidji seems to have owned him ever since he has been in the legislature, When you get him up there we don't think Thief River Falls will kick if you keep him to send down to represent you at the next session of the legislature.—THE SUNBEAM, June 20th, 1913.

Thief River Falls made a good fight for the location of the normal school, but they made one mistake and that was that they thought they owned the horse before they bought it.—The Sunbeam, July25th, 1913.

ONE WORD MORE

This school has been located in the jack pines of Beltrami county to boom the town site of Minneapolis realestate boomers, but the money to build has not been appropriated yet, hence the anxiety of the Bemidji Sentinel to have D. P. O'Neill re-elected to the next two sessions of the legislature.

The present county officials do not seem to be in any rush about filling for re-nomination, but we understand they are all willing to do business at the old stand for four years more.

We understand that John A. Duffy, of Red Lake Falls is being favorably mentioned as a candidate for Representative from this district. Mr. Duffy would make a good man for the position and here is hoping that we will hear of his announcement soon.

COST OF LIVING REDUCED.

The first shipment of Argentine butter under free trade reduced the price of that staple article 5 cents a pound in the New York market. Of course the consumer gets the benefit and the cost of living has been reduced. But how about the American producer? Now do not get mad and swear because you voted the democratic ticket, but hold on and figure how much cheaper you can produce the butter. Labor is about the first item to consider. Under protection you have been paying from $2, to $2,50 per day for men during the haying season. Under free trade you can hire just as good men for from 75 cents to $1, a day. Of course the men won't like it, but after they have taken care of the cows at night, just hand them a copy of one of them famous free trade speeches made during the last campaign, and tell them that the cost of living has been reduced.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates,

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate. I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered,

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON;
Thief River Falls, Minn.

POKE AT POWER BEHIND THE THRONE.

(Kasson Republican.)

Iverson's announcement rings true, and contains the following planks among others: Greater economy in expenditures, enforcement of liquor laws, reorganization of state departments and "team work" among the heads of the several divisions of the state government; declares for woman's suffrage in the following words: "The moral, social, industrial and political life of our state would be greatly advanced by giving the women an equal right to vote." In fact Mr. Iverson's announcement touches upon several questions that the people of the state are vitally interested in today. Mr. Iverson is serving his third term as state auditor and his record as such has been above reproach. He takes a poke at the present power behind the throne in the following language: "The 'invisible government' should be dragged from its place of hiding, exposed to the bright rays of publicity and stripped of all influence and power in legislative and governmental affairs. Public business should be conducted in the open and in the presence of all the people for whom governments exist."

WHO PAYS THE PRINTER?

On Saturday evening when it was time to pay off the type setter we offered in payment the platform of W. E. Lee candidate for governor, but it was not accepted, we then offered the platform carefully prepared by J. A. O'Perus for state auditor to be released for publication on Feb 10th, but the printer said he could not buy a pair of shoes with that We again promised that we would give him the next one that came, but he got mad and said 'dig up the coin.' and we did. Moral; If you want the people to think well of you pay your labor bills Don't expect the country newspaper editor to dig down in his own pocket to pay a printer cash for setting up long winded platforms, that you are about the only one that takes any interest in.

SKILL NEEDED IN PUBLIC BUSINESS.

(Delano Eagle.)

The Eagle is pleased to see State Auditor Sam Iverson announce himself as a candidate for the gubernatorial nomination at the next state primary election. When a business man or a large corporation wishes to increase the efficiency of its organization it engages nothing but expert help. The administration of our state affairs is going from bad to worse and we need an expert. Governor Eberhart, incompetent to keep down the tax levy or to point out a way, has evolved a scheme to organize a committee of business men to help him out. That is self-confessed inefficiency and reflects no credit on the administration. What we want is a man in the executive chair who knows his trade in every branch and who has sand enough to either whip the legislature into line for economy or hold the guilty members up to the light of public censure. We believe that Mr. Iverson is sincere when he says we need a revival of economy, and we also believe that his long experience in the state capitol is far more valuable than any political pot-stirring that can be indulged in by the powers that be.

GET RID OF SELFISH ADVISERS.

(Mankato Journal.)

A Republican exchange thinks that Sam Iverson, having been state auditor so long, should now step down and give some one else a chance. That has been one trouble in Minnesota, men have been called to the governor's chair who had no business experience with common affairs, saying nothing about the affairs of state. They have had to depend upon the advice of others and in so many cases these advisers acted from selfish motives. With Sam Iverson it would be different, as he knows the ins and outs affecting this state government better than any man in the state, and would be independent of the influences that are too largely dictating now.

RECAST POLITICAL CHESSBOARD.

(Hastings Gazette.)

The formal announcement of S. G. Iverson, state auditor, that he is a candidate for the Republican nomination as governor, although not unexpected, implies a recasting of the political chessboard in Minnesota during the coming year. It means much, not only to aspirants for the same position, but also to those seeking preferment in other capacities all along the line. Mr. Iverson is an able, competent man, with experience attained in continuous public service since 1881.

POLITICAL POT SIMMERS.

(Mapleton Enterprise.)

The political pot has commenced to boil in good shape although it would have been better if allowed to simmer until after the first of the year at least. Sam Iverson has filed as a candidate for governor and if other prospectives will now keep out of the way and give the Fillmore county statesman a chance Brother Eberhart will vacate the governor's chair.

HIGH TIME TO ECONOMISE.

(Faribault Pilot.)

Hon. Samuel G. Iverson, state auditor of Minnesota the past twenty years, has announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination for governor next year. He has adopted as his campaign slogan "Economy and Law Enforcement." The slogan will appeal to the taxpayers of Minnesota at present as they are beginning to learn from the constantly annual increase in the rates of state taxation that it is high time to begin to retrench and economize in the matter of state expenditures.

Mr. Iverson says "public officers who willfully neglect or refuse to enforce the laws within their jurisdiction should be promptly suspended and, if found guilty, removed from office."

Mr. Iverson has been an accommodating and efficient state auditor and with his large acquaintance should be a strong candidate for the Republican nomination.

MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

THE FARMERS RAILWAY.

CHEAP AND RELIABLE TRANSPORTATION FOR ALL PRODUCTS OF THIS TERRITORY.

The Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway Company has commenced the construction of the first division of 20 miles running eastward from Thief River Falls to the Township of Goodridge. The company expects to put this 20 miles in operation not later than the First Day of September, 1914. Extensions from the end of the First Division will then be started and placed in operation as soon as possible.

This railway will afford to the farmers of this district the very best of railway service for transporting their products to market. Arrangements have already been made so that it will be possible to load cars at the stations of the Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway and ship these same cars without reloading to any point on any railroad in the United States, without any additional switching or transfer charges. For instance, in accordance with the rates as laid down at the present time by the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of the State of Minnesota, you can ship a carload of 600 bushels of wheat from Grygla to Duluth for only $2.16 more than from Thief River Falls to Duluth.

THE MINNESOTA NORTHWESTERN ELECTRIC RAILWAY WILL BRING THE VERY BEST OF MARKETS. IT WILL INCREASE THE VALUE OF EVERY ACRE OF LAND IN THIS COMMUNITY. IT WILL MAKE FARMING HERE AS PROFITABLE AS IN ANY PART OF THE UNITED STATES.

Every land owner in this community should exert himself to secure this railway and should subscribe for at least one share of stock. The Company asks for no bonus. The stock will pay you a good rate of interest and prove a good investment. You can secure this railway in your immediate vicinity sooner by subscribing for some stock now.

STOCK WILL ONLY BE SOLD FOR THE FIRST TWENTY MILES.

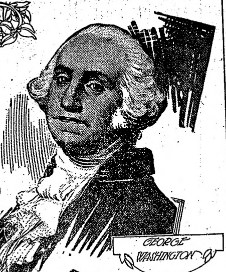
DEFECTIVE PAGE

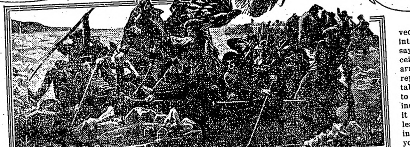
The WASHINGTON who never FAILED



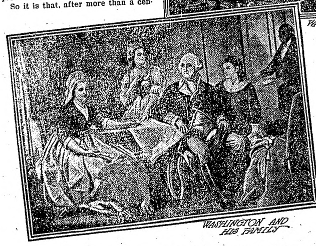
GEORGE WASHINGTON

MODERATION and determination are the two dominant characteristics of which time has not robbed Washington. Of them, the first is the one which has deprived him of a great deal of the appreciation which has been lavished on less deserving characters.

What ever the vices of the man, they were always held within respectable restraint. Whatever his virtues, he never gave them undue prominence.



WASHINGTON CROSSING THE DELAWARE



WASHINGTON AND HIS FAMILY

So it is that, after more than a century, there has come a tendency to depreciate the ability of the one man who, more than any other, would naturally be exalted. For a long time it was held that his fame was tarnished because he swore real oaths at the battle of Monmouth. That was succeeded by the present epoch, which has chosen to regard him as a lovable gentleman, with enough horse sense not to make a fool of himself and, by a series of events over which he had no control, to become the father of his country.

And yet it is doubtful if another character of the age is more to be admired for its many-sided excellencies. As a man, warrior and statesman, Washington yields to no figure of his time.

What place Washington held, in his own day, must now become a matter of interest. Shortly after his death, Felix Faulcon voiced the opinion of the French parliamentarians when he addressed the legislative assembly as follows:

"The tomb has claimed him who was the model of republican perfection. This is not the time to trace all this truly great man has accomplished for the liberties of America, the generous inspirations which he imparted to the French who were attracted to his school of arms; the sublime act which will ever add luster to his memory, when, after having exerted his talents in giving liberty to his country, he voluntarily relinquished supreme power to conceal his glory in the obscurity of private life."

Naturally, Napoleon was attracted to the great general who led an army of ragamuffins to victory, after a long campaign of almost unparalleled vicissitudes, and whose power was attested by the fact that none of his general, except Wayne, accomplished much after they left him. When the news of his death reached France, the first consul issued the following order:

"Washington is no more! That great man fought against tyranny. He firmly established the liberty of his country. His memory will ever be dear to the French people, as it must be to every friend of freedom in two worlds, and especially to the French soldiers, who, like him and the Americans, bravely fight for liberty and equality. The first consul, in consequence, orders that, for ten days, black crepe shall be suspended to all the standards and flags of the republic."

At almost the same the Gazette de France said:

"Washington is dead! The news in the time of the directory it would have been imprudent to announce. Now, the heart may with confidence abandon itself to all the generous emotions of the soul, and we may dare to weep at the tomb of a great man. A general funeral service has been ordered in America, and this will be observed by the citizens of every nation. No period has sustained a loss so irreparable as the end of the eighteenth century."

This concluding sentence may be taken as generally expressing the estimation in which the "father of his country" was then held. Since then, with that flash tendency to appreciate high-sounding phrases rather than sound statesmanship, it has become the fashion rather to exalt the orators and the writers, who had secondary roles, than to accept the verdict of colonial times.

It is doubly strange, too, that in a country whose citizenship is rapidly altering, because of the large and continuous additions from foreign lands, should have no one great work, not even an essay, which vitally and vigorously presents the character of its first great general, statesman and citizen.

When reading the first president's letters, it seems strange that his correspondence should never have excited more attention or study. By comparison they are almost unknown when one considers for example how much attention and controversy has been directed of late years to lives and writings of Hamilton and Burr.

Very strange it is, indeed, that the correspondence of so commanding a character as Washington should be so little known to the ninety and more millions of people who owe their liberty and prosperity to him. And to the fact that his letters are so little read may be attributed the further fact that his fame is that of a successful general rather than of a broad, constructive genius, whose all-seeing statesmanship guided a new nation of his own making to greatness.

Also, it is probable that no man who wrote as much as he did put so little on paper that is open to criticism. Read a dozen or more volumes of his correspondence, as compiled by Sparks, and you will find not one epistle which does not bear tribute to his love of freedom, his wisdom and kindliness of heart. All of them show why he never failed in anything of consequence he undertook. Without exception, they bear witness to the thought, the careful consideration, the sound judgment of the writer.

With these qualities dominant, there is lacking, as a matter of course, the bias, the egotism, the proneness to give way to the passions, that have caused so many able men to fail.

Above all, there is an abounding love of freedom, an all-powerful desire to serve the best interests of his fellowmen, that cannot fail to touch the heart of any one who cares to read the old volumes that have been shelved in favor of so much less worthy material.

Take him, for instance, as a soldier. His earlier show that he realized fully the difficulties of the tasks ahead of him. First of all, his breadth of vision prevented his army from being divided and subdivided by the claims of the various colonies that the troops they raised should be devoted to their own defense. As he wrote to the governor of Connecticut:

"I am by no means insensible to the situation of the people on the coast. I wish I could extend protection to all, but the numerous detachments necessary to remedy the evil would amount to a dissolution of the army, or make the most important operations of the campaign depend upon the piratical operations of two or three men-of-war and transports."

Again, when he was recruiting his forces, he was dismayed by the fact that not all the people were animated by motives as high as his. To his secretary, Joseph Reed, one of the closest of his friends, he wrote:

"Such dearth of public spirit, and such want of virtue, such stock jobbing, and fertility in all the low arts to obtain advantage of one knid or another in this great change of military arrangement, I never saw before, and I pray God's mercy I may never see again. What will be the end of these maneouvers is beyond my scan. I tremble at the prospect. . . . Could I have foreseen what I have experienced and am likely to experience, no consideration upon earth should have induced me to accept this command."

His letters during the winter at Valley Forge are models of their kind. But nothing he wrote, during his period of command, bears higher tribute to his character as a man than his letters to General Gage that "the officers engaged in the cause of liberty and their country, who by the fortune of war have fallen into your hands, have been thrown indiscriminately into a common jail, appropriated to felons."

General Gage insolently replied that but for his clemency the captured men would have been hanged, and made counter-charges that British captives were mistreated. To this Washington replied with the following letter:

"I addressed you, sir, on the 11th instant, in terms which gave the fairest scope for that humanity and politeness which were supposed to form a part of your character. I remonstrated with you on the unworthy treatment shown to the officers and citizens of America whom the fortune of war, chance or a mistaken confidence had thrown into your hands. Whether British or American mercy, fortitude, and patience are most prominent; whether our virtuous citizens whom the hand of tyrranny has forced into arms to defend their wives, their children, and their property, or the merciless instruments of lawless domination, avarice, and revenge, best deserve the appellation of rebels and the punishment of that cord, which your affected clemency has forborne to inflict; whether the authority under which I act is usurped or founded upon the genuine principles of liberty, were altogether foreign to the subject. I purposely avoided all political discussion; nor shall I now avail myself of those advantages which the sacred cause of my country, of liberty, and of human nature give me over you; much less shall I stoop to retort and invective, but the intelligence you say you have received from our army deserves a reply. I have taken time, sir, to make a strict inquiry, and find it has not the least foundation in truth. Not only your officers and soldiers have been treated with the tenderness due to fellow-citizens and brethren, but even those execrable parricides, whose counsels and aid have deluged their country with blood, have been protected from the fury of a justly enraged people. Far from compelling or permitting their assistance, I am embarrassed with the numbers who crowd to our camp, animated with the purest principles of virtue and love to their country.

"You affect, sir, to despise all rank not derived from the same source with your own. I cannot conceive one more honorable, than that which flows from the uncorrupted choice of a brave and free people, the purest source and original fountain of all power. Far from making it a plea for purity, a mind of true magnanimity and enlarged ideas would comprehend and respect it.

"What may have been the ministerial views which have precipitated the present crisis, Lexington, Concord and Charlestown can best declare. May that God, to whom you, too, appeal, judge between America and you. Under his providence, those who influence the councils of America, and all the other inhabitants of the United Colonies, at the hazard of their lives, are determined to hand down to posterity those just and invaluable privileges which they received from their ancestors."

To Washington's high personal character, and his lack of small weaknesses, his correspondence all bears testimony.

As a statesman, Washington was as sure, as broadminded and as determined as he was as a general. All his letters to his friends and to those who served him show that his efforts were directed toward the prevention, not only of entangling alliances abroad, but to calming internal dissensions and directing the business of the nation into healthy channels.

For a time the agricultural interests and the merchants saw the growth of manufactures with jealousy and distrust. But Washington yielded to no economic fallacies. Scarcely had the Revolution been brought to a successful termination when he wrote to the Delaware Society for Promoting Domestic Manufactures, in 1798, as follows:

"The promoting of domestic manufactures will, in my conception, be among the first consequences which may naturally be expected to flow from an energetic government. For myself, having an equal regard for the prosperity of the farming trading and manufacturing interests, I will only observe that I cannot conceive the extension of the latter (so far as it may afford employment to a great number of hands which would be otherwise in a manner idle) can be detrimental to the former. On the contrary, the concurrence of virtuous individuals, and the combination of economic societies, to rely as much as possible on the resources of our own country, may be productive of great national advantages by establishing the habits of industry and economy. The objects of your institution are, therefore, in my opinion, highly commendable; and you will permit me to add, gentlemen, that I propose to demonstrate the sincerity of my opinion on this subject by the uniformity of my practice in giving a decided preference to the products and fabrics of America, whensoever it may be done without involving an unreasonable expense or very great inconvenience."

Along educational lines Washington's ideas were equally sure and far-seeing. When the federal commissioners in 1795 were considering the erection of a univerity, he wrote to them as follows:

"It has always been a source of serious reflection and sincere regret with me that the youth of the United States should be sent to foreign countries for the purpose of education. Although there are doubtless many, under these circumstances, who escape the danger of contracting principles unfavorable to republican government, yet we ought to deprecate the hazard attending ardent and susceptible minds from being too strongly and too early prepossessed in favor of other political systems before they are capable of appreciating their own

"For this reason I have greatly wished to see a plan adopted by which the arts, sciences and belles-letters could be taught in their fullest extent, thereby embracing all the advantages of European tuition, with the means of acquiring the liberal knowledge which is necessary to qualify our citizens for the exigencies of public as well as private life; and (which with me is a consideration of great magnitude) by assembling the youth from the different parts of this rising republic contributing from their intercourse and interchange of information to the removal of prejudices, which might perhaps sometimes arise from local circumstances."

These few extracts have been selected at random from Washington's correspondence, extending over a period of 25 years. If they stimulate just a few persons to make a first-hand study of the life and writings of the father of this country they will have fulfilled their mission.

MOHAMMED'S TAIL

By GEORGE PHILLIPS.

Miss Theodora Bingham, director of the Mission School for Girls at Damascus, tossed upon the back of her camel. The file of beasts stretched away before and behind her, each with its swarthy Arab attendant, while Sheikh Abdullah, riding on his white mule, passed slowly alongside of the caravan, his hands holding the reins loosely and an expression of benign self-satisfaction upon his face.

Though she was the only woman with the caravan, Miss Bingham was not in the least perturbed. She had spent a lifetime in Damascus, she had seen the school grow from a thatched building to a lordly establishment covering two acres, numbering 300 inmates. She had just returned from a visit to New York, and was carrying back $7,000 in subscriptions, which, with a knowledge of the native methods of exchange, she had secreted in her baggage instead of forwarding through one of the extortionate native banks.

At Jerusalem she had joined the caravan, under the protection of the Sheikh Abdullah, to insure her safe arrival unmolested by desert nomads. And now Damascus was only two days' journey away, and the little package reposed in the saddle-bags among her other possessions.

Miss Bingham put out her hand to assure herself of its presence there. But it was not there. It had disappeared during the noontide halt.

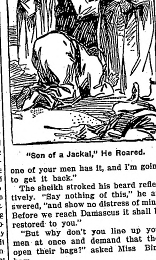
Her mind worked quickly. She remembered now that she had left the baggage for a couple of minutes to speak to the sheikh. Somebody must have suspected what it was she guarded so carefully. The thief had taken the money, and it was still in his possession.

As the sheikh rode slowly back Miss Bingham beckoned him. The old man came riding up on his mule.

"Somebody has stolen $7,000 from my bag," she said quietly.

Sheikh Abdullah looked at her benignly. "O foolish woman, why did you not entrust its care to me?" he asked. "Had I but known you had so large a sum my head should have answered for its loss."

"Well, I guess it was foolish of me," answered Miss Bingham, "but anyway, one of your men has it, and I'm going to get it back."



"Son of a Jackal," He Roared.

The sheikh stroked his beard reflectively. "Say nothing of this," he answered, "and show no distress of mind. Before we reach Damascus it shall be restored to you."

"But why don't you line up your men at once and demand that they open their bags?" asked Miss Bingham.

"One does not catch spiders in bear-traps," responded the sheikh, and spurring his mule, he rode back to the head of the procession.

The evening halt never seemed to begin. It was almost sunset before the sheikh shouted the order and the lone line of camels came to a standstill. Then the sheikh came to Miss Bingham.

"Great madam, have you a small bottle of sweet-scented essence, such as the Frankish women use to make themselves smell sweet?" he asked.

"I've got a sachet, if that's what you mean,' replied Miss Bingham. "What do you want it for?"

"By its means I shall restore to you the $7,000," said the sheikh, taking it and riding away.

Toward nightfall he assembled his men in line before the tent that Miss Bingham occupied.

"O dogs and sons of Eblis," he announced, "one of you has stolen treasures of value from the saddle-bag of the Frankish princess of mature age. Wherefore Mohammed, the white mule, shall put you to shame. Know, then, that in him rests such a gift of discernment that whosoever having stolen, takes hold of his tail, causes him to bray. Thus, O renegades and faithless ones, let each of you in turn enter the tent in which Mohammed eats, and place his hand upon his tail; and when he brays, behold, the guilty man is there."

Used as she was to Arab ways, Miss Bingham could hardly restrain her disgust at this tomfoolery. However, she said nothing until the ceremony was over. One by one the men of the caravan had entered the tent and laid a hand each on Mohammed's tail; but the mule had not brayed.

"What do you mean by all this nonsense?" Miss Bingham demanded of the sheikh angrily. "I want that money, and I want you to open the men's bags, or I shall think you are not anxious for me to get it back."

"O Frankish woman of age," replied the Sheikh gravely, "one does not catch leviathan with a smelt-hook."

The Arabs loitered in the vicinity, grinning at the Sheikh's discomfiture. But Abdullah seemed equal to the occasion.

"Since Mohammed has refused to assist me," he said, "may stripes be his portion, and the lowest place in the world to come. I have another method, for in the palm of each man I can read his acts of the day. Stand together and each man hold up his hand, palm upward."

When he had assembled his men the old sheikh went along the line, peering closely into each uplifted palm. Suddenly he stopped and jerked a man out of the row.

"Son of a jackal," he roared, "even now thou hast the Frankish woman's bag and the money."

The man fell grovelling upon his face, and a fearful awe was on the countenance of each of his comrades.

"Bring it here at once," the sheikh continued, "and if there be missing the least quota of a farthing thou shalt rot in Damascus jail."

Five minutes later Miss Bingham was in possession of her $7,000 again, and not a single bill was missing.

"But how did you do it, sheikh?" she inquired, a little later in the evening. "It seems as wonderful to me as it was to them."

"O Frankish woman," said the sheikh, a twinkle in his eye, "the thief did not lay hold of the mule's tail, fearing that he would bray."

"Well," inquired Miss Bigham, still mystified.

"Thus, O teacher of womanhood, the sweet-smelling powder with which I had rubbed the tail of Mohammed was not transferred to his palm, as was the case with the other men."

"Then the thief was the man whose hand did not smell of the sachet powder?" inquired Miss Bingham. "Well, that beats everything!"

"Verily, there are more ways of cooking a hare than boiling him, O Frankish woman," replied the Sheikh, smiling.

GREAT PIECE OF MACHINERY

Composition of the Human Body Truly Has Been Called Fearful and Wonderful Thing.

There are exactly 198 bones in your body: In the spinal column are 24; in the sacrum, or coccyx, 2; in your head, or cranium, 8; in your face are 14; the hyoid bone is one. Your chest and sides have 25, your right arm has 32, your left arm has 32, your right leg has 30 and your left leg 30.

Your heart beats from 70 to 86 times a minute, but the pulsations vary according to age: At birth, 130 times a minute; at 1 year of age, 120; at 3 years, 90; at 7 years, 85; at 17 years, 80; when full grown, 75; in old age, 65.

The normal adult has seven quarts of blood in the system. It is dark blue in the veins, because it is surcharged with carbonic acid, because its oxygen has been burned up and used in providing vital heat. The red blood is arterial, having lost its carbonic acid and become purified by its contact with the pure air in the lungs, from which it has taken a fresh stock of oxygen for the system.

The average temperature of the normal adult is 98 degrees. At midnight it is 97, at 4 a. m. it is 96, at 8 a. m. it is 98½, at noon it is 99, and at 4 in the afternoon it is 100, at 8 p. m, it is only 96½.

We breathe 16 times a minute normally and while the lungs hold between four and five quarts of air, only about a pint is taken at each inhalation. About 10,000 quarts of air pass through the lungs every 24 hours.

His Excuse.

"You've been drinking again!" said the wife, reproachfully.

"I object to your expression," answered the husband, with great dignity. "I will admit, though I don't need to, that I had a drink. What of it?"

"You promised me that you were going to quit."

"There you go! Does a promise to quit, as you so inelegantly put it, mean that I may never accept a drink when I am invited? Does it force me into a beastly state of teetotalism? Does it mean that I must confess to my friends that I am so weak that I must never be asked to—"

"Pardon me for being ungrammatical again, but may I ask you to can the oratory? Listen! I can go downtown without getting a drink—why can't you?"

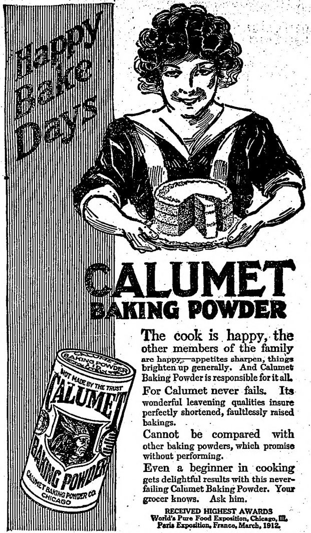
"Possibly you can, my dear. Indeed, I will acknowledge that you often do. But look how popular I am."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Gentle Intimation.

"Josh," said Farmer Corntossel, earnestly, "every year when the frost sets in you come back home askin' how soon dinner will be ready."

"Yes, father. And you haven't failed to receive me as the prodigal son."

"No. But I want you to revise your schedule and change your season. I want you to quit comin' as the prodigal son an' see if you can't drop in once in a while as a regular payin' summer boarder."



CALUMET BAKING POWDER

The cook is happy, the other members of the family are happy—appetites sharpen, things brighten up generally. And Calumet Baking Powder is responsible for it all.

For Calumet never fails. Its wonderful leavening qualities insure perfectly shortened, faultlessly raised bakings.

Cannot be compared with other baking powders, which promise without performing.

Even a beginner in cooking gets delightful results with this never-failing Calumet Baking Powder. Your grocer knows. Ask him.

You don't save money when you buy cheap or big-can baking powder. Don't be misled. Buy Calumet. It's more economical—more wholesome—gives best results. Calumet is far superior to sour milk and soda.

Arms and the Child.

Girl scouts exist in Germany also. Instead of camp-fire girls they call them something that sounds like a mixture of Fenimore Cooper and musical comedy—Pathfinderesses is the literal translation. Apparently, too, they go in for being military with true German thoroughness. One reads how a head game warden presented himself at the shop of a dealer in firearms in Berlin and desired to purchase a revolver.

"A revolver!" said the dealer. "I'm sorry, sir, but I've just sold the last gross of revolvers in the shop to the Potsdam battalion of girl scouts."

BACKACHE VANISHES RHEUMATIC PAINS GO

Few Doses of Croxone Ease Stiff, Sore, Swollen Joints and Muscles, Relieving Backache and Bladder Disorders.

If you suffer with backache—have pains in the neck or sides—nervous or dizzy spells—a few doses of Croxone will relieve the congestion and you will be surprised how quickly all kidney, bladder and rheumatic troubles will disappear.

Croxone promptly relieves these diseases because it really does reach the real cause. It soaks right into the walls and linings of the kidneys, cleans out the stopped-up inactive organs, neutralizes and dissolves the uric acid and makes the kidneys sift from the blood the waste and poisonous matter that lodge in the joints and muscles to scratch and irritate and cause rheumatism. It soothes and heals the delicate linings of the bladder and gives the kidneys renewed strength so they can filter the blood and keep you well.

Croxone is different from all other remedies. It is so prepared that it is practically impossible to take it without results. An original package of Croxone costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if it should fail in a single case.—Adv.

Men Fight On Their Stomachs

Napoleon so said. A man with a weak stomach is pretty sure to be a poor fighter. It is difficult—almost impossible—for anyone, man or woman, if digestion is poor, to succeed in business or socially—or to enjoy life. In tablet or liquid form helps weak stomachs to strong, healthy action—helps them to digest the food that makes the good, rich, red blood which nourishes the entire body.

Dr. Pierce's
Golden Medical Discovery

This vegetable remedy, to a great extent, puts the liver into activity—oils the machinery of the human system so that those who spend their working hours at the desk, behind the counter, or in the home are rejuvenated into vigorous health.

Has brought relief to many thousands every year for over forty years. It can relieve you and doubtless restore to you your former health and strength. GOPHER NEWS NOTES.

Minnesota Events of the Week in Condensed Form.

Virgina.—Michael Boylan was elected mayor of Virgina by a plurality of 39.

Albert Lea.—Two negroes who assaulted fireman Hefter of the Minneapolis & St. Louis road have been captured by Sheriff Oscar Subby.

Gasson.—The funeral of Tunis Slingerland, farmer and banker of Dodge county, was held here. He leaves an estate estimated at $2,000,000.

Big Lake.—An epidemic of scarlet fever here has caused the schools to be closed. The 5-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Gulliford died Sunday of the disease.

Barnesville.—Rumors are afloat that the defunct Barnesville National bank will be reorganized by local capitalists and become a home institution. Several capitalists are interested in the project..

Mankato.—The February term of the district court is on with eighty-five civil cases on the calendar and twenty-four cases for trial by jury. There being no business for the grand jury, none was called.

Sleepy Eye.—As a result of an open switch an extra eastbound freight train crashed into a way freight here, throwing three cars from the track. Carl Hanson, a freight hand, was thrown under the cars and sustained a broken leg.

Caledonia.—At the annual meeting of the Farmers' Co-operative creamery company held in this city, the following officers were elected: President, William Meitrodt; vice president, James Clifford; secretary, John Duffy; treasurer, R. D. Sprague. Over $35,000 was paid to patrons for butter the past year.

Wadena.—On Friday, Feb. 20, a "get together" banquet for farmers and business men will be held in Wadena. Over 150 men have thus far signified their intention of being present. The banquet will be served by women of St. Helen's guild. H. J. Maxfield, Wadena's candidate for congressman from this district, will act as toastmaster.

Minneapolis.—President Wilson has accepted honorary membership in the Minneapolis Veteran Firemens association. It was offered in complimentary recogniton of the president's work as a volunteer at a midnight fire at Pass Christian, Miss., early in January. He assumed direction of a bucket brigade.

Owatonna. — The Business Men's club is canvassing the city for subscriptions to aid Company I to build a big armory. The business men expect to raise $7,000. The company's present armory may be sold to a wholesale house and the money used for building. It is expected that between $20,000 and $25,000 will be raised for the new structure.

Fairmont.—Judge and Mrs. J. A. Everitt celebrated their golden wedding anniversary at the home of their daughter, Mrs. W. G. Brown. Judge Everitt was formerly department commander of the G. A. R. He served in the Seventh Maine volunteers for four years, when he was discharged because of physical disability, due to a wound received in battle.

Tower.—The following officers were chosen at the municipal election here Tuesday: Mayor, Charles Roland; recorder, Charles Lang; treasurer, Jalmer Pearson; municipal judge, F. C. Burgess; special municipal judge, J. G. Murphy; aldermen, A. Weinzierl, Charles Osterberg and J. Stovich; assessor, Andrew Bystrom. The election was the most hotly contested in years.

Winona.—The campaign being made by Dr. Alfred J. Chesley, epidemiologist of the state board of health, for the building of tuberculosis sanatoria in each county, will not bear fruit in Winona as this county has no money to spare at the present time. The county is completing the finest jail in the southern part of the state and plans to build a hundred miles of permanent roads under the provisions of the Elwell law.

Blue Earth.—The fifth annual exhibit of the Blue Earth Corn Growers' association was held here last week. Among the speakers were R. A. Schultz of Le Roy, "Corn Culture"; C. A. Leonard of Lakefield, the new county agricultural agent of Jackson county, "Selection of Seed Corn"; L. A. Butler of the state university farm, "The Care of the Corn Crop"; R. A. Smith, "Pork Production in Minnesota."

Mankato.—The board of education unanimously re-elected F. J. Sperry superintendent of the city schools, and increased his salary to $2,200. The board also considered the matter of limiting the cost of the graduation gowns of the girls of the graduating class. Last year the girls by voluntary agreement, limited the cost of material to $8. but many of them wore expensive gowns to the junior promenade. It is hoped this year to have a limit placed on the gowns for both of these events.

Owatonna.—One of the new and interesting features in short courses was the dairy short course conducted in Owatonna last week. Steele county is a dairy county. Because the short course was dairy work, the attendance of farmers was far better than was expected.

Alexandria. — Preparatory to the spring city election in which "no license" will be the chief issue, a two weeks' campaign was opened here by A. C. Rankin, temperance evangelist. The opening meeting drew a large audience and 128 signed total abstinence pledges.

ITCHING TERRIBLE ON LIMB

R. F. D. No. 3, Clarkfield, Minn.—"My trouble was of long standing. It started with some small red and yellow spots about the size of a pin head on my leg and every morning there was a dry scale on top covering the affected part and when those scales were falling off the itching was more than I could stand at times. The first year I did not mind it so much as it was only itching very badly at times, but the second year it advanced all around my leg and the itching was terrible. I had to be very careful to have my clothing around the affected part very loose. At night time I often happened to scratch the sore in my sleep. Then I had to stand up, get out of bed and walk the floor till the spell was over.

"I bought lots of salves and tried many different kinds of medicine but without any success. I got a cake of Cuticura Soap and a fifty-cent box of Cuticura Ointment and when I had used them I was nearly over the itching. But I kept on with the Cuticura Soap for six weeks and the cure was complete." (Signed) S. O. Gorden, Nov. 20, 1912.

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

35 BUSHELS PER ACRE was the yield of WHEAT

on many farms in Western Canada in 1913, some yields being reported as high as 50 bushels per acre. As high as 100 bushels were recorded in some districts for oats, 50 bushels for barley and from 10 to 20 bus. for flax.

J. Keys arrived in the country 5 years ago from Denmark with very little means. He homesteaded, worked hard, is now the owner of 320 acres of land, in 1913 had a crop of 200 acres, which will realize him about $4,000. His wheat weighed 68 lbs. to the bushel and averaged over 35 bushels to the acre.

Thousands of similar instances might be related of the homesteaders in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The crop of 1913 was an abundant one everywhere in Western Canada.

The Coronation of Nikolai

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

Nikolai and I were seated outside the Hotel New York at Vienna when he read me an extract from the Tageblatt. It was a summary of the long column that followed, and merely stated that Prince Leopold, of a certain Balkan state, the identity of which I shall conceal under the name of Transylvania, was to be crowned king on the following Monday.

"You have followed the events which led up to this, of course," said my companion.

"Not with much interest," I answered.

"Well," said Nikolai, "I will explain them to you. As you are doubtless aware, Transylvania has played a long and unhappy role as champion of the eastern Christians against the Turks. After five centuries of subjection, she achieved her independence in 1878. A prince from the native stock was chosen to rule the people. Unfortunately their many wars and insurrections had unsettled their habits and six months ago, his son was driven from the throne and a republic established.

"This proved disagreeable to Russia and Austria. A threat of war, which followed, induced the parliament to submit to the appointment of a new prince, Leopold, a scion of a petty German state. As a salve to his subjects, who hate him vehemently, he is to be made a king, and he arrived in Cheskaf, the capital, yesterday evening, for the first time in his life. On Monday he will be crowned in the cathedral with some little ceremony and strongly guarded, for riots are feared, and, if the mob gets hold of him, his life will be endangered."

"What is your scheme?" I asked.

Nikolai took up the paper and read aloud:

"'The new crown, with the orb, sceptre, and complete royal regalia, has arrived from Paris at the king's residence in Cheskaf, where until the coronation they will be displayed each day to his majesty's future subjects.'"

"You are not going to steal the crown?" I cried.

"I am going to take the next train to Cheskaf and have a look at it," Nikolai replied enigmatically. "Are you going to accompany me?"

That evening we were speeding over the vast Hungarian plains. At noon next day our train steamed into Cheskaf station. We engaged apartments at the best hotel and, that same afternoon followed the multitudes into the palace, to the room where the regalia were on exhibition.

Here we encountered our first disappointment, for the statement concerning the orb and scepter proved incorrect. There was neither. There was however, a magnificent crown, fresh from the Paris jeweler's, studded with pearls, diamonds, rubies, and sapphires; its value, Nickolai whispered to me, must have been close upon a million and a half in American dollars. Beside it lay a few of the king's decorations, but of trivial value.

"The crown alone is worth the attempt," said Nikolai, planting himself in front of it until moved on by the sentries. There were at least a dozen of these Germans, from Leopold's own principality, and they formed the butt of much jesting and scurrilous remarks among the native visitors, who evidently bore them no good will.

The crown was placed within a case of strong plate glass. Around this ran an iron railing, and the whole was enclosed in a network of tough, exceedingingly fine steel wire. Even had the sentries been absent it would have been difficult enough to get at our booty. Nikolai admitted defeat when we had returned to our hotel.

"Then for heaven's sake let us return to Vienna," I exclaimed. "The thing, as you say, is impossible."

"At least we'll see the coronation," Nikolai answered. "Who knows but that I may yet become a king. I have long wished to be. Once I nearly was, but that—" He paused. "Did you ascertain which was his majesty's apartment?" he asked.

He laughed when I replied curtly. "I did," he said. "I gathered its locality from some remarks let fall by one of the Transylvania chamberlains, who was abusing the German sentries. Transylvania is almost identical with French; Rome was the parent of either tongue. The apartment overlooks the inner courtyard, so that to reach it one must pass through the palace. One cannot enter from the street."

"In heaven's name, what is in your mind?" I cried.

"Leopold is still unmarried," said Nikolai thoughtfully. "That immensely lightens our problem. I hate to deal with women; they're apt to scream. Besides, one cannot well break into a princess' apartment—at least, not if one is a gentleman. Good-night, Summers."

And he strolled off to bed, leaving me a prey to suspense during the entire night.

The first moment that I clapped eyes on him the following morning he began again:

"The daily paper says that the arrangements for tomorrow's coronation are completed," said my companion. "The crown has been taken to the cathedral, where it is guarded. There the archbishop will anoint him and proclaim him king. Leopold will walk in a long, black gown to the ceremony, and, at the precise moment ordained, will cast it aside and reveal himself in all the splendor of a king. By the way, here is a colored supplement of him, to familiarize the people with his face. Don't you think we should be much alike if I had a square red beard like our beloved Leopold?"

I glanced at the portrait. There was indeed, a resemblance; had Nikolai a beard it would have been striking.

"And nobody knows him," said Nikolai, chuckling. He slapped his thigh, as was his habit in moments of excitement. "Summers," he said, "I am going to be crowned tomorrow. And we shall dispose of Leopold, for the nonce, in the cistern at the back of his bedroom. Yes, I looked over the ground last night after I left you. The Transylvanian plumbing arrangements are primitive."

Then from a pocket he pulled a square, red beard and put it on. I glanced at the picture; the resemblance was amazing. And now I knew that nothing I could say or do would restrain my companion from his prank. So I fell in with it perforce.

"Now here's the plan, Summers," he said, when he had gained my reluctant acquiescence. "At the palace I have already established my status as a detective, sent by the king of Hoch Darmstadt, who is Leopold's brother, to look after his interests. You know I was once a more or less important personage at the petty European courts, and these roles come very easy to me. Besides, I knew the king's handwriting, and Leopold recognized the signature on my credentials, or thought he did. He is desperately nervous and afraid of assassination tomorrow. So I have arranged to take up my station tonight, with my confidential assistant, at his bedroom door, while, in an ante-room, there will be stationed six Transylvanian officers and six of his Germans, whose mutual hatred may be reckoned on to prevent any conspiracy against him and, incidentally, to divert attention from us. Now then:

"At 8 o'clock in the morning we enter to robe him—he won't trust his own people for that, he's so afraid of a poniard thrust. At 9 the heralds arrive at the palace with his coach. At 10 we reach the cathedral. At 11 the gorgeous, million-and-a-half dollar crown is placed on Leopold's head. He throws off his black robe, appears in all his glory, and marches down the aisle behind his guards and gets into his coach, to drive back to the palace amid the cries of a mob thirsting for his blood. Summers, all this while, Leopold, bound and gagged, will be balancing himself on tip-toe in the cistern at the back to his bedroom, to keep his head above the water. I shall march down the aisle with my crown on—but I shall not drive to the palace. Overcome with terror, I shall address the mob, plead for my life, abdicate, and drive to the railroad station to take train for Vienna. They'll see that I get into the train. But in the excitement they won't be thinking of the crown. That will go into a pocket which I have had specially constructed in the most voluminous portion of my royal robes, which were made for me in Vienna."

I gasped with amazement. The man detailed this scheme as though he were planning some simple detail of business. And the plan was perfect, down to every detail. None knew the king. Only the unexpected could prevent success. And Nikolai had planned it all in Vienna, before he even spoke to me of Transylvania!

Let me here interpose to say that not even Nikolai's mind could have imagined the denouement which frustrated him.

Shortly before midnight we were installed in the prince's ante-room. Nikolai was in the complete attire which Leopold was to wear on the morrow, concealed beneath a long overcoat. In his pocket was the red beard. We found the six Germans and six Transylvanians scowling at one another from opposite sides of the room. Beyond, behind a closed door, Leopold was sleeping, dreaming of his kingship.

The officers, who had been instructed as to our advent, saluted us briefly and would have paid no further attention to us, but Nikolai, who seemed to speak every language perfectly, at once launched into a panegyric of Leopold's virtues. He spoke in German, which the Transylvanians did not understand. They could perceive, however, the drift of his speech, and their scowls grew deadly. If looks could have devoured, Nikolai would have disappeared. The Germans became more and more enthusiastic, and, welcoming Nikolai as a brother, opened a case of champagne. The Transylvanians, not to be outdone, opened another and drank, ignoring us with studied insolence.

Before long Nikolai made his next move. All were flushed with wine and shouting loudly, regardless of their royal ward. They were in the good-fellowship stage.

"Don't let us quarrel, gentlemen," he pleaded. "I am going to say a few words to those fellows, for the sake of amity."

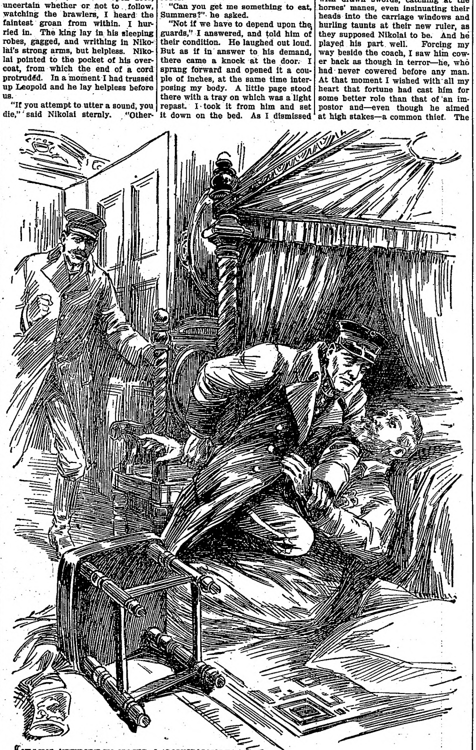
And, crossing the room, he addressed the Transylvanians in their own tongue. Their astonishment was boundless. They thawed under his persuasive eloquence as he urged harmony between the factions.

Then he turned the screw again, and, having brought the two parties to speaking terms, he sowed the seeds of discord. Before another hour had passed, swords were rattling in their scabbards. And Nikolai was forgotten. He had effaced himself, and the guards, morosely drunk, were passing the lie one to another. Nikolai looked at me. I looked at my watch; it was half-past four.

"Now!" he said, and slipped into the king's bedchamber.

As I stood by the half-open door, uncertain whether or not to follow, watching the brawlers, I heard the faintest groan from within. I hurried in. The king lay in his sleeping robes, gagged, and writhing in Nikolai's strong arms, but helpless. Nikolai pointed to the pocket of his overcoat, from which the end of a cord protruded. In a moment I had trussed up Leopold and he lay helpless before us.

"If you attempt to utter a sound, you die," said Nikolai sternly. "Otherwise you shall not be injured. Summers, you take his feet."



"IF YOU ATTEMPT TO UTTER A SOUND YOU DIE."

Together we carried him through his bedroom to the bath-room. Beyond this lay an immense cistern, connecting with the roof, in which rainwater was stored. It was empty, all but for a few inches of muddy water, for pipes had been laid that summer to the new reservoir. We ascended the ladder which led to it, carrying our burden. We hoisted him with an effort and let him drop inside. Then we stood and looked at him. He was not hurt, but his face was gray from terror.

"The servants will find him this evening," said Nikolai to me. "The palace will be empty through the day. And anyway, he can't cry." Then a thought came into his head.

"Listen!" he whispered in German. "There is a conspiracy to have your life. We are your friends. Do you understand?"

The helpless king nodded.

"I am fulfilling your brother's instructions to watch over you. The palace is in the hands of the revolutionaries. If they discover you, your life will not be worth a moment's purchase. At night we shall come for you and take you to safety. Now do you understand? I crave your majesty's pardon."

He unbound and ungagged him. He kissed his hand, and we departed, leaving the prince cowering there.

"If I know human nature," Nikolai said, "he will not stir or cry. It would have been inhuman to have left him trussed and gagged."

When we returned, the partisans were still quarreling.

"And now," said Nikolai, "I think I will go to bed. Help me off with my royal robes."

Ten minutes later he was sleeping soundly in the bed of the prince. The royal robes hung over a chair.

I had received my instructions. I was to waken him at the appointed hour and dress him, not forgetting the beard. Then I should use my discretion. I might attempt to gain entrance to the cathedral, or proceed directly to the railway station. In any event, if we missed each other, we were to meet at the same hotel which we had occupied in Vienna. I carried out my instructions. The tumult gradually abated as the guards sank into various stages of intoxication; by seven o'clock the entire twelve were stretched out upon the floor, sleeping off the effects of the champagne.

I aroused Nikolai at eight. For a moment he did not realize where he was; then he sprang to his feet and smiled as he caught sight of the royal robes.

"Can you get me something to eat, Summers?" he asked.

"Not if we have to depend upon the guards," I answered, and told him of their condition. He laughed out loud. But as if in answer to his demand, there came a knock at the door. I sprang forward and opened it a couple of inches, at the same time interposing my body. A little page stood there with a tray on which was a light repast. I took it from him and set it down on the bed. As I dismissed him, I looked after him into the anteroom and saw him wake the guards. When I turned my head Nikolai and the tray had disappeared.

I looked around in consternation. A moment later I heard him coming from the direction of the bathroom.

"I gave the food to that poor devil in the cistern," he said. "I told him that the palace is in the hands of the mob, but that they had given up the search for him and that relief will arrive by nightfall. Oh, he hasn't stirred, Summers. Now help me dress."

Five minutes later he was struggling into the royal robes. He cast the black coat around his shoulders. He affixed the square red beard. And he stood before me, a very fair counterfeit of the prince. Then he strode to the door, opened it, and stood there. Squinting over his shoulder, I could barely restrain my laughter. Twelve very haggard and disheveled figures struggled to their feet and saluted him. They were in no state to detect the fraud that was being played upon them.

Then, from without, I heard a fanfare upon horns. I hurried back to the bedroom and looked out. In the courtyard below, twelve heralds, in fantastic, mediaeval costumes, were drawn up, and, as I watched, I saw the blue and yellow coach, drawn by eight cream-colored ponies, swing over the stones. Following it, two by two, came mounted guards. I turned back. Nikolai stood facing me.

"Good-by, Summers," he said, gripping my hand. "Or au revoir, rather; we meet in Vienna."

And he marched forward to meet his followers, the cloak cast over his arm, his plumed hat pulled well down, every inch as kingly as the man whose place he had taken.

I heard the footsteps of the attendants die away down the corridor. Now I could go where I pleased, for there was no more order in the palace. Leopold's recent arrival with his retinue, his own attendants and those of his brother, had thoroughly upset all plans and arrangements. Nobody knew who his neighbor was. Guards and attendants in every possible costume swung pell-mell into the courtyard, forming in a rabble around Nikolai, their king. I saw him enter the coach and leave the palace. Following it, I found myself all at once in the middle of a jeering mob, not openly hostile, but wanting, I could see, only the stimulus of a leader to convert them into a bloodthirsty horde. They thronged around the coach, which could proceed through the streets at a snail's pace only, thrusting themselves among the guards, who rode with drawn swords, catching at the horses' manes, even insinuating their heads into the carriage windows and hurling taunts at their new ruler, as they supposed Nikolai to be. And he played his part well. Forcing my way beside the coach, I saw him cower back as though in terror—he, who had never cowered before any man. At that moment I wished with all my heart that fortune had cast him for some better role than that of an impostor—and—even though he aimed at high stakes—a common thief. The prize, the magnificent crown of Transylvania, with its rubies and diamonds, seemed a strangely insignificant guerdon to be won at the expense of such emotions.

They conveyed him onward to the cathedral. At the doors, some order had been created. A regiment of Transylvanian troops was drawn up, and, as Nikolai stepped from his vehicle and passed in, something like a cheer came from their throats. To the minds of these men he represented something of the ancient glories of their race. How he could have changed hostility into enthusiasm at such a juncture, had he been set upon a throne and not on a crown!

I forced my way into the cathedral. I was resolved to witness the drama to its conclusion. I elbowed aside all in my way. While men muttered and stared and jostled, I calmly made my way on until I found a place among the ranks of the nobility. They made room for me perforce, and then, as the archbishop came forward, in mitre, with golden wand, the tumult died away.

I saw Nikolai stand straight up before him. He cast aside the sable cloak that covered him and flashed forth in all the magnificance of royal array. A sigh went up through the whole vast assemblage. This was their first king—their king, even though imposed upon them from without. Then, stooping, the archbishop raised something in his hands and, holding it aloft, placed it upon Nikolai's brow.

It was a plain iron circlet!

And suddenly I remembered.

What fools we had both been, and how a little thing had defeated all our far-flung aims. The papers had said that Leopold would be crowned. Yes, but they had not stated with what crown, for everybody knew. Why, had I not read of it in school books, was it not almost a portion of the elementary education of every man, that the princes of Transylvania received, upon the day of their coronation, not the jeweled crown of their kind, but the circlet of rusty iron, fashioned from cannon taken from the Turks upon the glorious battlefield of Rastenics, a symbol of their warrior history?

They bent low before him, all that vast assemblage. I saw Nikolai stride from the dais and advance down the aisle toward his coach at the door. I sprang to my feet and followed him, pushing my way over the bodies of the half prostrate multitude. I was five paces behind him at the door. It was flung open, and, as Nikolai appeared in the sunlight, a roar went up from a vast multitude without. But it was no roar of welcome—it was a clamor of death.

They sprang for him, fighting back his guards, who formed a solid circle around him. They beat them back, they clutched at him, they seized his robe. The crown fell from his head. A courtier seized it before it touched the ground. Nikolai was at the carriage door. They urged him in. But he hesitated, and, with bent shoulders and quavering knees he looked a king no more. And suddenly, with what seemed a supreme effort, raising his hands, he cried in accents tremulous with fear:

"I abdicate my throne. Spare my life, good people of Cheskaf, and let me go home."

For one brief instant, overcome with astonishment, the mob was silent. Then hideous cries went up:

"His life! His life! Death to the usurper!"

But others answered them.

"No! Let him go. To the railroad station! Take him to the railroad station!"

They sprang upon the box, they dragged at the wheels, they lashed the horses into a furious gallop. Running at top speed, amid the cheering throng, I arrived at the terminal in time to see them drag Nikolai from the coach and hurry him to the train. A few of his attendants, seeing that his cause was hopeless, managed to form a flying wedge in front of him and to beat back the baser element among the mob. They thrust him into a carriage and stood guard before the door with swords drawn, while Nikolai, cowering within, bespattered with filth and mud, his long robes trailing upon the ground, hid his face in feigned humiliation and terror. Somebody brought up an engine. Somebody gave the signal for departure. His guards, stood with shame-bowed heads as the revolving wheels carried their broken idol from the ken of Transylvania forever.

When I rejoined him in Vienna the papers teemed with conflicting stories of the emeute. Some said that Leopold had taken flight in fear; others spoke of an impostor, believed to be a lunatic, who had been found in Leopold's apartments in the palace that same evening, claiming to be the king. Some even said that the king's enemies had contrived a plot whereby a tool of theirs was crowned in place of the real sovereign, and abdicated in the streets to ruin his cause. But Leopold now lives in his brother's castle in High Darmstadt; and in the window of Paix et Lepine, those famous jewelers of Paris, you may still see the unpaid-for crown which they manufactured once for the ex-sovereign of Transylvania.

Lights Floating on Quicksilver.

Quicksilver is used mainly, according to the United States Geological survey, in the manufacture of fulminate for explosive caps, of drugs, of electric lighting and scientific apparatus and in the recovery of the precious metals, especially of gold, by amalgamation. An increasing demand has been reported in manufactures of electric appliances. An interesting and increasing use in Scotland is the floating of the lights of lighthouses upon a body of quicksilver. The metal is not consumed, of course, and the loss in use is insignificant.

Concerning this Consul Fleming writes as follows: "Quicksilver is used for 'floating' the revolving lights in lighthouses. The commissioners of Northern Lighthouses, Edinburgh, have in their charge 90 lighthouses on the coast of Scotland. Up to the year 1900 the revolving lights were borne on rollers. The 'float' system has been gradually introduced, however, and is now in operation at 30 coast stations and will be used at all others. The lighting machinery rests on a pontoon which runs on quicksilver in a groove. The quantity of mercury required in a lighthouse is from seven to eight flasks of 75 pounds each."—Consular Reports.

Joke Founded Merely on Tradition.

Baldness, if it is a sign of anything at all, is a sign of respectability. The conventional jest about the gayety of the baldheaded man has absolutely no foundation in fact. Occupants of front rows at the theaters and musical comedies are not at all remarkable for their baldness, whatever else their claim to distinction.

One of the prominent papers in London made an extensive investigation to prove the truth of this statement. The result was that the proportion of baldheaded men at the churches and universities and lecture halls in London was so enormously in advance of the baldheaded men at the theaters that there was no possible conclusion other than that baldness is really an indisputable concomitant of respectability and that the jokes about bald heads and the front rows of theaters are merely traditional.

When a Duck Loves You It's for a Life Time

ST. LOUIS, MO.—When an Indian runner duck becomes your friend he is your friend always. In time of trouble he will neither run nor duck, for he is no Indian giver, and when his confidence is placed there it remains. Briefly, he is some bird. In view of his constant qualities it is not strange that the other day when a case in which Indian marathon ducks were the issue came before Justice of the Peace Frank Healey, he lifted his robes to keep from tripping, stepped off the bench for a moment and allowed the case to rest with a jury of ducks. They acquitted themselves admirably.

QUACK
QUACK

The action was brought by Mrs. Frank Thomas, who sought to attach three Indian sprinting ducks which have for the last few months been in the keeping of Samuel Whitsell. Both Mrs. Thomas and Mr. Whitsell asserted that they rightfully owned the ducks, and unto the justice they told of the marvellous qualities of the Indian galloping duck, how he quacked and made his friends welcome and so on. Bith litigants told the justice that all they wanted was a chance to show how well ducks knew them. Justice Healey at this point became a negligible factor in the case. He told Mr. Whitsell and Mrs. Thomas that the depth and quantity of the quacks as each of them approached the crate would settle the matter for all time. They agreed.

When Mrs. Thomas walked slowly toward the waddling jury the noise was amazing. The fat duck nearest the proceedings nearly sprained his bill trying to indicate that he recalled her. A long duck quacked a brass aria with gulping variations and the smallest of the three quacked something sounding like "Rock Me to Sleep, Mother." The justice coughed and prepared to start for his home.

He paused to watch Mr. Whitsell, principally through courtesy.

At this point the Indian Runner duck came into his own. If the three regarded Mrs. Thomas as a friend they looked upon Mr. Whitsell as a relative. Any one who was careless enough to miss the fall of Port Arthur will never be able to grasp the quality of the racket that shook the courtroom. And in a few moments Mr. Whitsell walked toward his home in the wake of the Indian running ducks, quacking, "Home, Sweet Home," as they ran.

Harlem's "Apartment Houses," Flats and Goats

NEW YORK.—Harlem is that portion of Manhattan island which is bounded on the north by New York Central freight yards, Van Cortland park, Yonkers and goats; on the south by the city New York, on the east by the magnificent East river, with its artistic conglomeration of coal barges, garbage scows and sewer outlets, and on the west by the majestic Hudson and Riverside drive, together with the New York Central's freight tracks. Sometimes you can't see the Hudson from Riverside drive, but if you wait long enough, maybe the New York Central will move its freight and cattlecars and allow you to see the drift wood, sewage, dead dogs and cats, etc., washed upon the ban Hudson before referred to.

Harlem was once noted for its goats, which were abont and marketable of that species grown any place in the worl ever, goats have given way to children despite the fact that justly famous "Harlem flats" usually object most strenuously to dogs, cats, parrots, automatic pianos and children. It should be mentioned that Harlem is more than noted for its flats and "apartment houses." There is a difference between a flat and an "apartment house." A flat house is one of those tomb-like buildings, so numerous in Harlem, where the rent does not exceed $35 per month. Also the flat house is usually occupied by motormen, chauffeurs, street car conductors, etc., whereas the "apartment house" is occupied by head waiters, police lieutenants, poets, writers, newspaper men, clerks, etc. There you get the social distinction.

Beau Night Is Observed in Philadelphia Church

PHILADELPHIA.—"Beau night" was the unique but official title of a social gathering at the Cohocksink Presbyterian church, Franklin street and Columbia avenue, the other night. Fifteen couples of the neighborhood, mainly residents in boarding houses, gathered in the church by special invitation in a "get together" party.

I THOUGHT I HEARD TH' CHAPERON, DIDN'T YOU ?
WHISPER

The invitation was originally issued really to the young women of the neighborhood. They were asked to bring their "beaus" to the church and spend the evening in playing games, impromptu musical entertainments and just such social intercourse as they would enjoy were they at home.

Chess and checker tables were scattered over the room and a piano filled with popular music occupied one corner. Posted at the door were Mrs. Beulah Ridge and Miss Arlta Elizabeth Copp, chaperons, who introduced new couples and saw that they were properly entered in the games. The eight side rooms of the big chapel were also thrown open. These, it was explained, are to be used by couples who desire more seclusion.

High Cost of Living Cuts Down Porter's Tips

CHICAGO.—Mance Reese is going on the trail of the absent tip. Mance wields a whisk broom and a blacking brush as a porter in a barber shop. He says that the anti-tipping crusade has gained such strength that it is almost next to impossible for him to support his family. At least this is the explanation he gave when arraigned before Municipal Judge Uhlir in the court of domestic relations on a charge of failure to support his wife, Mattie, and his two-year-old son, Clarence.

"This portering business isn't what is used to be, judge," he said. "Everybody has joined this anti-tipping crusade. The customers hold on to their dimes tighter than they used to because the high cost of living has crowded the barber shop porter clean off the map. If portering is a legitimate business then it should entail more wages. If it isn't a business, then I haven't been working."

"I guess that's the trouble with you," said the court. "You haven't been working. You're too lazy to earn the $9 a week you say is your wages."

"You can't work, judge, unless you've got a customer to work. The customers nowadays grab their hats and coat and get out of the shop before you whisk the broom within a yard of them. You know they don't tip any more, judge, because you don't do it yourself."

"You are wrong," replied Judge Uhlir. "I always tip the porter when he brushes me properly. This is the third time you've been up before me for failure to support your wife. I'll give you one more chance to pay your wife $4 a week or out to the bridewell you go."

WHO'S WHO AND WHY

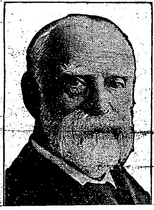
IS FRIEND OF NATIONAL GUARD

Secretary Garrison told the adjutants general of the National Guard of about 25 states, who called to pay their respects to him the other day, that the National Guard has no more sincere friend than he. The adjutants general were asked to meet at Washington at the time set for the assembling of the national militia board, to go over various questions of interest to the National Guard organizations, including consideration of the militia pay bill and the brigade and divisional organization of the militia as outlined by the war department.

Secretary Garrison reminded his visitors that in any organization, if it is efficient, there must be a seat of supreme power. The best interests of the government would be met, he said, by having the war department the center of authority in militia affairs.

"There should be," said Secretary Garrison, "some free, open channel of communication between the National Guard and the secretary of war through which the National Guard of the entire country could make known its needs. If there is not at present such a means of communication, I am ready to receive suggestions any of you can make to achieve that result."

JAMES BRYCE, VISCOUNT



Mr. Whitelaw Reid laid it down as a sort of rule that all men who rose to peculiar eminence in America were Scots. It happened, of course, that he was speaking in Scotland at the time, but his catalogue was convincing, and when Lord Rosebery, in proposing a vote of thanks, begged to be allowed to remind the audience of exceptions, he had to do it warily. "The few exceptions to the rule seem to me hardly worth mentioning," he began. "The names of Washington and a few more cross the mind." But, on the whole, he had to allow that the Scot, and the Ulster-Scot in particular, was a person of paramount standing in the States. "When I come to the branch of our race," continued Lord Rosebery, "which has been grafted on to the Ulster stem, I take off my hat in reverence and awe." James Bryce is an

NEW YORK'S FIRST WOMAN OFFICIAL

The new woman has officially arrived; she has been appointed the head of a department in New York city. When New York city puts its stamp of approval on the new woman, the rest of the country need have no fear in taking her up.

Dr. Katherine Bennett Davis, who has been named commissioner of corrections by Mayor John Purroy Mitchel of New York, is not exactly new. She has been a public official some time, and the mayor runs little risk in placing her at the head of this important bureau of his administration; but she is the first woman to be named the head of a department in the big city. She has been highly successful as the superintendent of the Bedford Hills reformatory for girls and this leads to predictions of success in her new office.

She isn't telling how old she is; whose business is it anyway? But you can do some guessing. The World's Fair at Chicago was held in 1893, that is more than 20 years ago. At that time she had charge of an exhibit called the Working Man's Model Home. She demonstrated that it was possible for a man and his wife to live on $500 a year. We wonder if she would attempt anything so rash now. Prior to that she had taken her A. B. degree at Vassar in two years, which is going some.

MAN WHO SAYS "NO!"

Nobody loves the chairman of the appropriations committee! In the house of representatives of the United States he is chosen largely on his ability to say "No!" and to say it nastily, if necessary, for a mild and lady-like "No" is sometimes construed as a "Yes."

"No!" and "I object!" are the words that must be constantly on his lips. The pose he must assume before his fellow-members is a cantankerous one. He must be prepared to take the responsibility, in the eyes of the public, for extravagant expenditures of public funds which he cannot prevent, and at the same time to accept the blame for the death of a vast amount of popular legislation carrying appropriations.

The big, good-natured American public ever is urging upon its representatives in congress laws which make further inroads on the public treasury. A government that spends money is always more popular than one which saves it. There is small political nutriment for the average congressman in trying to save public money.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

U. S. Keeps Tab Upon Army and Navy Deserters

WASHINGTON.—As Uncle Sam finds trouble in locating recalcitrant members of the army and navy who take "French leave," there is a bureau in both the war and navy departments to keep tab on these individuals. In the war department the bureau is presided over by a "graybeard" who has been in the service since eight years after the Civil war. He is so familiar with the files of the office under the adjutant general that each yellow-back envelope is almost like an old friend. "Like father, like son" is an old adage, and it was never more true than of conditions in this office.

DERN TH' DESERTERS

Like the old man who presides over the destinies of the yellow-back paper envelopes and the antiquated furniture, are the methods which he employs in conducting the affairs of the bureau.

"I would like you to look up for me the name of Ray Schultz or Roy Schult or Schults," was a request made of this official recently. It has been estimated that in the past ten years nearly 1,000,000 record enlistments have been filed in the office. As the files are arranged, however, a search is not the arduous task that upon first glance it seems to be.

On every side of the room, which runs the entire length of one wing of the war department, are steel file cases. The enlistment date was secured in a little less than two hours.

An answer to a similar inquiry in the navy department was obtained in a little less than 20 minutes.

The system there is entirely different. It follows the index system of the modern department store.

As an officer explained, it sometimes developed that hurry was mandatory. He pointed out the case of an enlisted man who had been arrested in a southern city for deserting his ship, which had been ordered to Mexican waters.

The enlisted man upon arrest denied he was an enlisted man. No immediate proof could be obtained that he was in the navy or that he was a deserter. The only accusation against him was brought by a witness who thought he had recognized the man. Navy officials were communicated with, but the only word received by the court officers was "hold the prisoner for identification." It was three days before the court was completely convinced that the enlisted man was a member of the navy.

The files of the army, navy and marine corps for the past ten years, it is estimated, contain 5,000,000 names.

Everything Under the Sun at Special Prices

"EVERYTHING but a nursing bottle!" was the conclusion reached by Byron R. Newton, assistant secretary of the treasury, commenting on the wide and inexhaustible range of articles in the schedule of the general supply committee, showing that the government is prepared to supply at special contract prices to all departments and administrative bureaus in Washington. "It embraces every other commodity

CAN SUPPLY ANYTHING UNDER THE SUN
Uncle

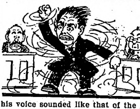
"Nursing bottles—bottles—ah, under laboratory apparatus. Bottles—but not the right sort. Hospital supplies. Here we are," said the private secretary, pointing out an item to Mr. Newton.

"5620. Bottles of samples. (d) Nursing, graduated, 12 ounces," Mr. Newton read in the book.

"By jove. Even a nursing bottle. It has every thing under the sun that can be bought," he admitted. And so it seems.

Pen Picture of Senator LaFollette on Rostrum

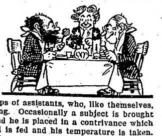
DID you ever see Robert M. LaFollette speak? It is more of a sight than a sound. He doubles himself into knots, grinds his teeth and puts on every "prop" of intensity known to the forensic play-actor. He looks as if he means business. One constantly expects to hear him say something that will rip the stars from their appointed places and tumble the indigo firmament upon the frightened worlds. But he never says it. That's where the joke comes in. And that's what gives point to an observation made recently by W. Sinkler Manning. One evening recently Senator LaFollette was making a speech on end, his eyes glittered, his voice sounded like that of the ghost in Hamlet, his snaky fingers wiggled and waved through the air at the terrified Democrats. The blood mantled his face; his teeth ground. At any moment he might say: "Fe-fo-fi-fum, I smell the blood of a Roosevelt Mun." But he didn't. He said nothing of importance whatsoever, nothing that might not have been uttered in tones as douce as that of a mating dove. Mr. Manning watched him for a while, then, turning in disappointment, he remarked with a sigh:



"I live always in the hope that he will utter some sentence so vital that it will justify the expression on his face."

Here Are Two Men Who Get Paid for Eating

IT sounds like the ideal job when one hears of getting paid for eating, but there are two men in Uncle Sam's employ who draw their salaries mainly because of this, and they will vouch for the fact that such a position is by no means as simple a little thing as a person might suppose. Of course they do more than this. They investigate into foodstuffs, prepare reports and do other things that a layman can hardly explain. But they get paid for eating as well.



The two men are Dr. C. F. Langworthy, chief, and Dr. Robert Milner, assistant, in the bureau of the bureau of food hygiene of the department of agriculture. These two men have a corps of assistants, who, like themselves, are required to do plain and fancy eating. Occasionally a subject is brought in, under the auspices of Uncle Sam, and he is placed in a contrivance which looks like a cell in a police station, and is fed and his temperature is taken. Reports are made as to the effect that the food had on him.

Not long ago a cheese investigation began. Every kind of cheese, rich, juicy cheese, crumbly cheese, cheese that was odorless and cheese that smelled like a Tammany investigation, was brought into the office. Dr. Milner picked out a nice, ripe cheese and cut off a generous slab.

"Everybody try some," he urged, biting into his slice, and everybody did.

The point was to determine whether cheese could be assimilated. The office decided that it could and, inasmuch as some of the hardy workers ate six ounces a day without suffering the slightest ailment, the office seemed to be right.

TREASURER OF N. Y. COMMITS SUICIDE

WAS TO HAVE APPEARED AS GRAFT PROBE WITNESS.

WORRY LIKELY CAUSED ACT

Body of John J. Kennedy Is Discovered by Son in Bath Room—Affairs of Treasury Office in Perfect Order, Declares Governor.

Buffalo, N. Y., Feb. 17.—John J. Kennedy, state treasurer, who was to appear today before the New York grand jury to testify in the graft inquiry, took his own life here.

Body Found by Son.

His body was found by his son in a small lavatory off the ball room of the Markeen hotel where he had lived with his family. His throat was cut and an open razor lay beside him.

Temporary insanity, induced by worry over his pending appearance before the grand jury, was given by his attorney, Michael F. Dirnberger, as the only reason for the act.

Mr. Kennedy was ready to start for New York. A sleeper ticket was found in his pocket.

Appeared in Good Spirits.

Mr. Kennedy had appeared to be in excellent spirits. On Saturday he met a number of close political friends and spent several hours with them. In the evening he attended a dance in the hotel with his son, William H. Kennedy. Sunday, after greeting his wife and daughter on returning to the hotel, Mr. Kennedy said he was going to his room to lie down until luncheon. The son went to the apartments to summon his father shortly afterwards.

Not finding him there he went to the lavatory off the ball room. When he pushed open the door he saw Mr. Kennedy lying on the floor.

Attorney Dirnberger called attention to the fact that the subpoenas requiring Mr. Kennedy's presence at the John Doe investigation followed his appearance before the grand jury on January 29 at the request of District Attorney Whitman. At that time Mr. Kennedy signed a waiver of immunity and was examined at length by Mr. Whitman.

Examined Affairs Carefully.

Mr. Dirnberger said that for the past ten days he had been in constant touch with Mr. Kennedy. Last week, when they were in Albany, Mr. Dirnberger examined carefully into all the affairs of the state treasurer's office, he stated.

"Everything done by Mr. Kennedy in the discharge of his duty as state treasurer," continued the statement, "I found had been done properly and in a most upright manner, and entirely in accordance with the law applicable to that office."

Kennedy's Books Examined.

Albany, N. Y.—Governor Glynn said that he had been informed by the comptroller's office that it had checked Mr. Kennedy's accounts Monday and found them correct.

The governor immediately ordered a full audit of the books. It became known after the suicide that Arthur L. Warner, chief assistant to Commissioner Osborne in the investigation of state departments, has been investigating reports that the state treasurer was intimately connected with a bonding company doing a large business with state contractors.

It is understood this inquiry had reference to an alleged association between Kennedy, George H. McGuire and Charles W. Murphy, Jr. A witness at the John Doe proceedings in New York said Mr. Murphy gave h.m assurances that he had sufficient influence to control the awarding of certain contracts.

To Aid Unemployed Thousands.

Washington, Feb. 17.—To find work for the unemployed thousands in the nation's greatest cities, the federal commission of industrial relations began an investigation to extend from Boston to Kansas City. Attention first will be given to public and private employment agencies, to reveal to what extent the trouble is due to their lack of organization, and efficiency, and four investigators have been assigned to this task with orders to report within six weeks.

Mrs. Charles Smith Becomes Novice.

New York, Feb. 17.—Mrs. Henrietta Nicholls Smith, widow of Charles Emory Smith, former postmaster general and former ambassador to Russia, has become a novice in the Institute of Our Lady of Christian Doctrine in this city. Relatives said that Mrs. Smith would not take the veil for at least a year.

Hundred Hurt in Church Riot.

South Bend, Ind., Feb. 16.—Seven persons were probably seriously injured and nearly a hundred others hurt here in a riot that resulted when twenty-five policemen attempted to aid Sheriff Edward Swanson in carrying out the order of Judge W. A. Funk, of the circuit court that the Rev. Stanislaus Gruza, be placed in charge of St. Casimier's Polish church. The crowd was composed of about 2,000 men and women and after fighting for two hours they were successful in blocking the efforts of Father Gruza

CARRANZA DISTRIBUTES CLOTHING TO THE POOR

General Carranza (arrow) at the distribution of clothing, etc., to the poor of Hermosilla. The supplies were collected from the merchants by the young folk of the city for those who had suffered from the ravages of the war and the distribution was directed by the constitutional leader.

SUFFRAGE LAW IS CONTESTED

SUPREME COURT WILL DECIDE VALIDITY OF MEASURE.

Result of Finding in Illinois Will Probably Not Be Known Till After Election.

Springfield, Ill., Feb. 16.—The fate of the Illinois woman suffrage law is in the keeping of the supreme court. Oral arguments, supported by written briefs, have just been made before the court. The constitutionality of the act was vigorously assailed by attorneys representing William J. Scown, in the case brought by him against the Chicago election board, and just as vigorous were the arguments made by attorneys in the law's defense.

When briefs in the case were filed, the court was requested to give an early decision. This the court refused to do and in the oral arguments the request was not repeated, although the printed brief asked that this be done. In the regular course of events the decision would come at the April term, too late to have any effect on woman suffrage at the April election, at which time numerous municipalities and townships will vote upon the local option issue. Votes of women at such elections are expected to be a big factor.

In the event the suffrage act is found unconstitutional it is probable the court would announce the decision at this term, which will end the latter part of the present month. Attorneys on both sides of the case expressed themselves as having little hope that a decision would be had before the close of the April term of court.

The woman suffrage case, which has attracted widespread interest because of the attack on the constitutionality of the measure and its importance to political affairs of the state, was brought to the supreme court on appeal from the decision of Judge Foell of the superior court of Cook county.

FERDINAND MAY COME TO U. S.

Bulgarian King Convinced He Could Learn Much of Advantage to His Realm.

Sofia, Feb. 16.—If affairs of state permit, King Ferdinand will visit the United States at an early date. He will be accompanied by Queen Eleanore and their daughter, the Princess Eudoxia.

King Ferdinand is convinced that Bulgaria could learn more from the United States than from any other country on the best methods to develop the indutries of his kingdom and therefore purposes to take with him in addition to the queen and princess a number of able men and on their return to Bulgaria will apply the lessons they have learned to the teaching of others.

When he received the American commissioners of the Panama-Pacific exposition a few days ago King Ferdinand told them that he long had intended to visit the United States and hoped to be able to make the journey in April.

Women Attack Registrations.

Chicago, Feb. 16.—Representatives of Woman's political organizations who have canvassed the registration from the First ward have attacked approximately 1,000 registrations and ask that the names be stricken from the poll lists. The largest number of suspects were in the lodging house precincts. One of those whose right to vote was challenged was Municipal Judge John R. Caverly, who registered from a downtown hotel.

Vanderbilt Yacht Is Abandoned.

New Orleans, Feb. 16.—Ten members of the crew of the yacht Warrior, owned by Frederick W. Vanderbilt, left on board when the yacht went aground several weeks ago off the Colombian coast, have abandoned the vessel, according to a telegram received here. The message said there was little likelihood of floating the yacht before April. Mr. and Mrs. Vanderbilt, their guests, and about 38 of the crew were taken off the Warrior soon after she went aground.

COLLISION WAS DUE TO HIGH SEA RULES

STRICT OBEDIENCE CAUSED SINKING OF MONROE AND LOSS OF CREW.

CAPTAIN JOHNSON EXPLAINS

Followed Out Laws for Fogs to the Letter, But Nantucket Captain Is Accused of Failure to Obey Same.

Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 16.—Captain Edward F. Johnson, commander of the steamship Monroe, testified in the trial of Captain Osmyn Berry, of the steamship Nantucket, that if he (Johnson) had violated the international rules of the high seas, he probably would have avoided the collision of the two ships and the consequent loss of 41 lives.

This was brought out in his cross-examination by counsel for Captain Berry, who is charged with negligence.

What Rules Provide.

The international rules provide that in case of fog a steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as circumstances permit, stop her engines and then move with caution until danger of collision is over.

Captain Johnson testified that when he heard the Nantucket's fog whistle off the Monroe's starboard bow, he stopped his engines and that a minute later, when he saw the loom of the Nantucket's lights, he went ahead full speed to port.

Possibility of Safety.

"If I had put my helm hard astarboard and gone ahead full speed when I heard the fog whistle, I probably would have cleared the Nantucket. That is the only possible thing I think I could have done to avoid the collision, but I would have been violating the laws."

This testimony brought about a curious situation. Captain Johnson's adherence to the rule helped make the collision, while one of the charges against Captain Berry is his failure to obey the same rule.

Captain Johnson finished his testimony after having been on the witness stand three days. His cross-examination by counsel for Captain Berry did not bring out anything that differed materially with his testimony on direct examination.

U. S. May Have Vice Admirals.

Washington, Feb. 16.—Six vice admirals for the American navy would be authorized under a bill passed by the senate, after an extended debate in which senators told how the commander of the battleship fleet in Mexican waters might have to take orders from a ranking foreigner. The navy has been appealing for years for revival of a higher grade than rear admiral. "The ablest, best and most resourceful officers will be chosen for the new grade," said Secretary Daniels, "not necessarily the present seniors in rank."

May Stop Parcel Post Changes.

Washington, Feb. 16.—With the $310,000,000 postoffice appropriation bill the senate committee reported an amendment to prevent further changes in rates or extension of the parcel post without congressional authority.

Municipal Employment Bureau.

New York, Feb. 16. — This city's temporary employment bureau and labor clearing house began operations under the supervision of the commissioner of licenses. The bureau was established by Mayor Mitchel, at the request of charity organizations. It is proposed to list through the bureau the names of men and women looking for employment and then distribute these lists to local employment agencies. In addition, the lists will be open to public view.

GORE'S ACCUSER ON STAND

WOMAN SUING BLIND SENATOR TELLS HER STORY.

Gives Details Leading Up to Alleged Attack Upon Her by Oklahoma Solon.

Oklahoma City, Okla., Feb. 14.—Mrs Minnie E. Bond told a jury in district court here of alleged indignities which she said she suffered at the hands of U. S. Senator Thomas P. Gore of Oklahoma and described in detail an attack which she alleged occurred in a Washington hotel March 24 last, the basis for the suit on trial in which Mrs. Bond asks $50,000 in damages Three other witnesses, Dr. J. H. Earp, Kirby Fitzpatrick and T. E. Robertson, also testified in corroboration of Mrs. Bond.

Mrs. Bond was on the witness stand the greater part of the day. A grilling cross-examination failed to shake her testimony in any material feature.

According to Mrs. Bond, she met the senator in Oklahoma several years ago and went to Washington last spring when her husband, Julian Bond, was a candidate for appointment as internal revenue collector here. She visited Senator Gore in the interest of her husband's candidacy several times at his office, she said, where, on two occasions she charged, he seized her.

Because of the number of men about the senator's office she refused, she said, to make further visits there and by mutual agreement, met him at her hotel March 24, when she alleged, he caught hold of her, threw her across a bed, and in her efforts to free herself her eyeglasses were broken, her face scratched, and her hand lacerated. On cross-examination, she said her health had been impaired as the result of the alleged attack.

Mrs. Bond was closely questioned by attorneys for Senator Gore as to her acquaintance with politicians in Oklahoma, laying the foundation, it is believed, for introduction of testimony in support of their contention that the suit is the result of a political conspiracy. Senator Gore is a candidate for renomination at the Oklahoma primaries in August.

Mrs. Bond, a mild mannered woman, and rather frail in appearance, maintained her composure throughout the examination. Mrs. Gore, wife of the defendant, sat directly opposite Mrs. Bond throughout the day and frequently the gaze of the two women met.

All of the witnesses heard yesterday in support of Mrs. Bond admitted that they failed to accomplish the purpose of their visit to Washington last spring—appointment to federal positions.

CREW REMAINS ON STEAMER

Vessel Driven Aground at the Mouth of Chesapeake Bay in a Snowstorm.

Lewes, Del., Feb. 16.—The steamer Katherine Park, bound from New Orleans to Hamburg, with a cargo of cotton and grain, was driven ashore in a snowstorm at the mouth of Chesapeake bay, near Cape Charles. The steamer is lying easy and is in good condition.

Life savers from the Smith's Island station went to the rescue, but the crew refused to leave the vessel.

When the steamer went aground Captain Patterson sent out wireless calls for aid and the revenue cutter Onondaga was dispatched from the Norfolk navy yard. The Onondaga and a wrecking tug, which had been stationed at the scene of the Monroe disaster, about 25 miles distant, stood by the Park.

Swedish Struggle Sharper.

Stockholm, Feb. 16.—The constitutional struggle is growing sharper. King Gustave, persisting in his endeavor to secure a Liberal cabinet, invited Baron Hammarskjold, former minister of ecclesiastical affairs and a member of The Hague court of arbitration, to form a new ministry. Although Baron Hammarskjold advised King Gustave to resort to the Conservatives for the selection of a cabinet, his majesty requested him to reconsider his refusal and attempt to form a ministry.

GUARDS GUILTY OF KILLING STRIKER

THREE COPPER MINE GUARDS AND DEPUTY SHERIFF CONVICTED.

JURY OUT SEVENTEEN HOURS

Doubtful if Another Shooting Case Pending and Involving Same Men Will Be Tried Now.

Houghton, Mich., Feb. 17.—Guilty of manslaughter, was the verdict reached by the jury here in the case of three mine guards and one deputy sheriff charged with killing Steve Putrich, a striking copper miner.

Three from New York.

James Cooper, Arthur Davis and William Groff, three of the convicted men, are from New York. They were guards at the Waddell-Mahon mine. Edwin Polkinghorne, the deputy convicted, was recommended for clemency. Harry James, the other deputy on trial for the killing, was acquitted in accordance with the instructions of the court.

Ten ballots and nearly 17 hours' deliberation were required to reach a verdict. The jury was instructed by the court that they might find a verdict for either second degree murder or manslaughter.

Four Men Jailed.

The four convicted men, who have been at liberty under $5,000 bonds, were turned over to the custody of the sheriff.

James was released, but was ordered to report in connection with the killing of Aloiz Tijan, with which crime the five men also are charged. It is regarded as doubtful whether this case will ever be tried.

Thomas Raleigh, another Waddell-Mahon guard, who also was involved in the Seeberville shooting, disappeared on the eve of the trial, and has not been caught.

The case attracted widespread interest throughout the copper country, owing to its connection with the strike. The Waddell-Mahon men were brought here to help protect the property of the mining companies and the lives of non-union men employed to fill the strikers' places.

CAPTAIN DID NOT FALTER

Rebel Officer Forced to Execute His Brother and Stepfather as Bandits.

Pearson, Chihuahua, Feb. 16.—The fortunes of war called upon Captain Rafael Martinez to execute his brother and his stepfather as bandits here, and he did not falter.

Those two Mexicans and three others were arrested for the murder of Charles Redd, an American Mormon of Colonia Juarez. Although the brother and stepfather pleaded with Captain Martinez, who commands the rebel garrison here, not to execute them because of the ties of relationship he refused to listen to their pleas and carried out the orders given him by General Villa. The men were shot to death by a firing squad in the hills east of Pearson with nearly the entire population of the mill town as an audience. The prisoners were buried where they fell.

Redd was killed a few days ago by the five men at Colonia Juarez because he had protested against a milking of his cows.

LIBERTY OR RAILROAD FARE

Missouri Republican Committee Hears Plea of Women Suffragists.

St. Louis, Feb. 14.—"Give Us liberty in Missouri or railroad fare to Illinois or Kansas."

With this plea for her sex, Mrs. Jesse Hardy Stubbs of Washington, press chairman of the congressional union for woman suffrage, closed her address before the Republican state committee here. Mrs. Stubbs said:

"The question of woman suffrage is no longer one of propaganda, but purely a political one. The women of this country will ally themselves with any political party in the future that will give them equal franchise with men."

The movements of every congressman is being watched closely by women in Washington, she said, and their records would be used by women in the next congressional campaign.

She predicted that President Wilson and any congressman who is now unfavorable to the cause would meet heavy opposition from the women voters, should they seek re-election.

Will Marry Best Vote-Getter.

Chicago, Feb. 16.—"I will propose to the woman who brings me the most votes," said Earle C. Hales, republican candidate for alderman from the thirty-first ward, in opening his campaign. Six feet tall blue eyes, high forehead, with black hair, Hales has sounded the death knell of all the old-time political tricks of rolling up a plurality—such as kissing babies, handing out cigars, giving away turkeys, etc.—by offering himself in matrimony.

SWEEPSTAKE UPON SWEEPSTAKE

CANADA ADDING OTHERS TO ITS SERIES OF VICTORIES.

A Manitoba Steer Carries Off Similar Honors to Those Won by a Half-Brother in 1912.

When Glencarnock I., the Aberdeen-Angus steer, owned by Mr. McGregor of Brandon, Manitoba, carried off the sweepstakes at the Chicago Live Stock Show in 1912, it was considered to be a great victory for barley, oats and grass versus corn. So that there might be no doubt of the superiority of barley feeding, Manitoba climate, and judgment in selecting the animal, Mr. McGregor placed in competition in 1913, another Aberdeen-Angus, a half-brother to the animal that won last year, and secured a second victory in the second year. In other classes he had excellent winnings, but the big victory was the sweepstakes for the best steer. This victory proved that Manitoba-grown barley and oats, and prairie hay, had properties better than any contained in corn, which in the past has been looked upon as being superior to other grains in fattening and finishing qualities. Not only this, but Glencarnock's victory proves that the climate of the prairie provinces of western Canada, in combination with rich foods that are possessed by that country, tends to make cattle raising a success at little cost.

Other winnings at the live stock show which placed western Canada in the class of big victories were: Three firsts, seven seconds, and five other prizes in Clydesdales.

The winners, Bryce, Taber, Sutherland, Sinton, Mutch, McLean, Haggerty, Leckie and the University of Saskatchewan are like family names in Saskatchewan. Each one had "the goods" that won honor to himself and combined made a name and record for Saskatchewan.

Look at the recent victories won by western Canada within the past three years.

In February, 1911, Hill & Sons of Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, showed a peck of oats at the National Corn Exposition, held at Columbus, Ohio, and carried off the Colorado silver trophy, valued at $1,500.

In February, 1913, the same men, father and son, had a similar victory at Columbia, N. C., and should they win in 1914 at Dallas, Texas, they will own the trophy.

In 1911, Seager Wheeler of Rosthern won $1,000 in gold at the New York Land Show for the best 100 pounds of wheat.

In 1912 at the Dry Farming Congress at Lethbridge, Alberta, Mr. Holmes of Cardston won the $2,500 Rumley engine for best wheat in the world.

In 1913 at the Dry Farming Congress, held at Tulsa, Okla., Mr. P. Gerlack of Allen, Saskatchewan, carried off the honors and a threshing machine for the best bushel of wheat shown in competition with the world.

In 1913 at the International Dry Farming Congress at Tulsa, Okla., Canada won the majority of the world's honors in individual classes, and seven out of the sixteen sweepstakes, including the grand prize for the best bushel of hard wheat.

The grand prize, a threshing machine, was won by Paul Gerlack for best bushel of hard wheat, which weighed 71 pounds to the bushel, and was of the Marquis variety.

In the district in which the wheat was grown that won this prize, there were thousands of acres this year that would have done as well. Mr. Gerlack is to be congratulated, as well as the province of Saskatchewan, and western Canada as a whole, for the great success that has been achieved in both grain and cattle.

Other prizes at the same place were:

Best peck of barley, Nicholas Tetmiger, Claresholm, Alberta.

Best peck of oats, E. J. Lanigan, Elfross, Saskatchewan.

Best bushel of flax, John Plews, Carnduff, Saskatchewan.

Best sheaf of barley, A. H. Crossman, Kindersley, Saskatchewan.

Best sheaf of flax, R. C. West, Kindersley, Saskatchewan.

Best sheaf of oats, Arthur Perry, Cardston, Alberta.

In district exhibits, Swift Current, Saskatchewan, won the Board of Trade Award, with Maple Creek second.

Other exhibitors and winners were:

Red Fife spring wheat, E. A. Fredrick, Maple Creek.

Other variety of hard spring wheat, S. Englebart, Abernethy, Sask.

Black oats, Alex Wooley, Horton, Alta.

Western rye grass, W. S. Creighton, Stalwart, Sask.

Sheaf of Red Fife wheat, R. H. Carter, Fort Qu'Appelle, Sask.

Sheaf of Marquis wheat, C. N. Carney, Dysart, Sask.

Oats, any other cariety, Wm. S. Simpson, Pambrun, Sask.

Two-rowed barley, R. H. Carter, Fort Qu'Appelle, Sask.

Six-rowed barley, R. H. Carter, Fort Qu'Appelle, Sask.

Western rye grass, Arthur Perry, Cardston, Alta.

Alsike clover, Seager Wheeler, Rosthern, Sask.—Advertisement.

The MARSHAL

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal New figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The general offers Francois a home at the Chateau. The boy refuses to leave his parents, but in the end becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis' son while the former goes to America. The Marquis before leaving for America asked Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her lackeys. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill, in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis's brother Francois lures the Austrians from the hotel allowing the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants, and through him sends word to his friends of his plight. The general, Alixe and Pietro hear from Francois and plan his rescue. Francois as a guest of the Austrian governor of the castle prison inspects the interior of the wine cellar of the Zappis. Francois receives a note from Pietro explaining in detail how to escape from his prison. Alixe awaits him on horseback and leads him to his friends on board the American sailing vessel, the "Lovely Lucy."

CHAPTER XIX.

The Sacrifice.

Young Henry Hampton, thrilled to the core at this drama, bent over him, as Battista laid him on the deck, and looked up anxiously at Pietro.

"Is he living?" he asked.

He was living, though for an hour or two the devoted friends who cared for him doubted if they had not got him back only to lose him. But that last effort of the change to the ship being past, when consciousness came again he grew strong more rapidly.

"I thought—the Austrians—would nab me—as I came aboard," he whispered, smiling gaily as he gasped the words to Alixe. "It was—firm in my mind."

And Alixe laughed at him, and told him that they were far out on the Adriatic now, safe under the American flag, and the Austrians left two hundred miles behind.

"Even if they had—nabbed me," whispered Francois, "those two days with you would have paid."

And Alixe shuddered a little and told him to go to sleep and stop thinking of Austrians, for they were out of his life now forever.

"My seigneur," said Francois next day when the general took his turn at sitting by his bed, "may I ask a question?"

"Any question in the world, Francois, my son," the general growled at him, as if the tender words were a defiance to an enemy.

Francois hesitated. "About Alixe and Pietro."

The general shook his head. "Ah that! That I cannot tell you, Francois. Sometimes I believe that I have been mistaken, that—" the general as he stopped looked oddly at Francois and smiled. "Sometimes I believe that even I, even Gaspard Gourgaud, might make a mistake in trying to play the good God, and arranging lives. That might be—yes. In any case I cannot tell."

Francois, thinking deeply, hazarded another question. "He loves her?"

"I believe so, indeed," said the general. "He cares most to be with us—with her. Ah yes, I have no doubt that he loves her. But why it goes no farther—sapristi! It is beyond me—that! I would knock their foolish heads together, me—but that is not convenient."

"Does she love Pietro?"

"Mon dieu! How can a mere man say that? She is a woman. I do not know—not in the least," the general exploded at him.

"But Pietro loves her?" Francois asked again, his wistful smiling eyes searching the general's face.

"Yes—I am sure of it."

And Francois smiled.

"No one could help it," he said half to himself.

In a day more little Battista came into Francois' cabin and put clothes on him and wrapped him like a mummy in coats and rugs, and carried him in his arms up on deck, and there laid him in a hammock on the sunny side of the ship. And the salt air blew on his face and he gulped it in, and by and by Alixe brought a chair and sat by him and read to him, and Francois lay quiet and wondered if heaven could be any improvement on this.

So, on that long, bright, calm morning at sea Francois lay in the hammock and watched the million little waves glisten and break for unknown miles over the sunlit water, and listened to the voice he loved best in the world, as it told him of those others whom he loved also, and of the places dear to him; and he wondered that he had indeed come through the long nightmare of prison to this happiness.

"Mr. Hampton has been talking to me about Virginia; it must be a beautiful country," said Alixe. "I should love the free friendly life of those great domains. I believe I could leave France and Vicques for such a country as that, where there are no political volcanoes on top of which one must live. With us it is always plotting and secrecy. Always a war to look back on or to look forward to. I should like to go to Virginia."

"But," said Francois, with his great eyes glowing, "the war one now looks forward to in France will be short and glorious. And after that will be peace, for there will be a Bonaparte ruling, and that means strength and good government."

"How you believe in the great captain and in his blood," and Alixe smiled down at the pale face on fire with its lifelong enthusiasm.

"One must," said Francois simply, and paused, and went on. "For me—you know, Alixe, how it is. How the star of the Bonapartes has always seemed to be my star! I believe that. I believe that my life is tied to that house. Nopoleon was more than human to my mind, his touch set me aside for his uses in my cradle."

"And made you a chevalier," Alixe considered. "That was a true accolade, Francois. You would have a right to that title under another Bonaparte."

"I believe so, Alixe."

"And my father believes it. So you must hurry and get well and come back to France and be fit for work when the prince needs you, Chevalier Beaupre. My father has told you that a movement is preparing? He is reckless, my father, and it troubles me. It might be unsafe for him to live in France if his part in these plots were known."

"Then you could come to Virginia—to Carnifax," and Francois smiled.

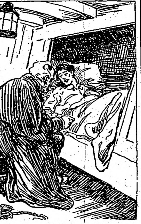
But Alixe flushed. "That is Pietro's estate, not ours," she said quickly; and then she rose and bent over the sick boy. "I must go to my father now," she said, and caught his pitiful hands suddenly in both hers. "But oh! Francois, I wish I could tell you how it changes all the world to have you back again"—and she was gone.

Francois, trembling with a rapture he could not quiet, lay, not stirring, because he feared to break the spell of the touch of her hands; feeling within him a rebel hope that yet he would not let take hold of him. Could it be? Was it true? Did she care for him and not Pietro? Was that the reason that in all these years she and Pietro were still only sister and brother? Yet, he caught and choked the thought. Even then he had no right, he could not, would not tell her what she was to him. He would be Pietro's friend always as he had promised long ago; more, a thousand times more now, when Pietro had given back to him freedom and life and hope.

CHAPTER XX.

A Social Crisis.

On a day the ship sailed into a splendid roadstead, big enough to hold the ships of half the world. Then into a wide flashing river, the James river, four or five miles wide down there at its mouth. And up and up and up the bright river, the narrowing river, between its low green banks, with now and again a glimpse of a large house and of gardens and lawns green with June, as one sailed past.



The General Shook His Head.

Harry Hampton told Francois who lived in them as they went by—Harrisons and Carters and Byrds and Randolphs — strange-sounding, difficult, English names in the ear of the Frenchman. Young Mr. Hampton knew them all, it seemed; many of them were his cousins; Francois listened, surprised, interested, to the word picture which the Virginian unconsciously drew, as he talked of every-day happenings, of a society and a way of living quite different from any the Frenchman had ever heard of.

With that they were in sight of Roanoke house—one might see the roofs of the buildings over the trees—Harry Hampton pointed it out with a touch of excitement in his grave manner. Then, as one slipped along the sparkling water, there was a sharp bend in the stream, and as they turned it the large silvery green slope of the lawn lay before them, with its long wharf and barges lying at the waterside, and a ship unloading its return cargo from England.

"It is the Sea Lady" called young Hampton. "She is in before us—and she sailed so long after."

He made a quick movement forward with his pathetic broken step—for this only son of the Hampton family was a cripple.

There were people gathering on the lawn, negroes drawn up in line; the women in bright-colored turbans, men and women both showing white teeth as they grinned with the pleasure and the excitement of watching the ship come in. Then a white light figure ran down the broad greenness, and a girl stood, golden curls on her shoulders, a straw hat with blue ribbons tying down some of the golden curls, but not all—stood and watched and waved an eager friendly hand.

"It is my cousin Lucy," Harry Hampton said, and Francois, looking at him, saw his eyes fixed on her intently.

In a few minutes more, leaving the ship with his halting careful step, Francois saw him kiss her cousinly—yet it seemed not altogether cousinly—and with that he was saying a word about "My new friend, the Chevalier Beaupre," and the girl's quick handclasp and the warm welcome in her voice of honey, made Francois feel as if a place in her friendship had been waiting for him always.

Then, from back of her, from somewhere, towered suddenly a tall man, with large features, and first seized Harry Hampton's hand and then turned to the stranger with the same air of entire pleasure and hospitality.

"My nephew's friend is welcome at Roanoke house," he said, and Francois, with his few words of English, understood enough to be warmed to the soul at his first contact with southern hospitality.

"It is my uncle, Colonel Hampton," Harry's voice was explaining.

They would not hear of his going to Carnifax—not for days, not for a month; why should he go at all?—Colonel Hampton asked. If he were to be only a year or two in Virginia, why trouble to set up housekeeping alone in that big house, when Roanoke house was here and in order, and only too glad to keep him. So Francois for a week or two stayed. And found himself, shortly, a notability. Harry Hampton, his boyish ambition for adventure and daring denied every personal outlet, because of that accident in babyhood which had started him in life hopelessly lame, was as proud of his salvage from the Austrian bird of prey as if Francois' record had been his own. Much more frankly proud, for he could talk about it, and did. Alixe had told him a great deal, and the episode of the headlong rescue of Prince Louis Napoleon, the capture and imprisonment and final theatrical escape, went like wild-fire about the countryside, and stirred all the romance of the warm-blooded southerners. Every house wanted the hero to break bread, and under young Harry's proud wing Francois went gladly to meet all these friends of his frend. As the general had said years ago, his simplicity struck the finest note of sophisticated high breeding; moreover, he had lived with high-bred people in more than one country; the aristocrats of Virginia were delighted with his young nobleman, as they thought him—with his charm of manner and his stirring history, with the lines of suffering still in his thin face and the broad lock of gray—the badge of that suffering—in his dark hair; with the quaint foreign accent too, and the unexpectedness in the turns of his rapidly increasing English.

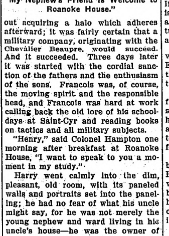
And now he had left Roanoke, and was living in the great old house on Pietro's land, the old house which had been lived in a hundred years before Pietro's father had bought it, the old house in which grandchildren of Pietro live today.

Something in his odd broken English, something in his vivacity and energy, something in the warmth of the heart which the poor souls felt in him—none quicker than negroes to feel a heart—fascinated the slaves who fell to his unaccustomed management. He had met Henry Clay and the proud aristocrats of Virginia as men and women, and given them the best of himself; he met these thick-lipped, dim-souled, black people no otherwise, and gave them the same. By the crystal truth in him the first had been vanquished, and it happened not differently with these other human beings. Pietro's mishandled property grew orderly month by month; Francois, in the saddle most of the time, riding from end to end of the plantation, found his hands full and his work interesting, and his health and strength coming back—though that was a slower progress.

The people who do most are likely to be the people who can do a thing more. Young Henry Hampton, ruled out of the larger part of his natural pleasures by that stern by-law of nature, which had made him lame, appealed to Francois' sympathy every day more deeply. The one thing which the lad could do was riding. "Henry," Francois spoke, as the two trotted together down a shady lane of the plantation on the way to the far fields where negroes worked in the autumn sunlight, "what would you think of organizing a mounted troop of militia?"

The boy's face flamed with excitement. What would he think of it? He would think it glorious, wonderful, half a dozen big adjectives.

There were many young men in the neighborhood; all of them rode; none of them had enough to do; Francois had a hold on them—a man may not spend five years in a dungeon because of a dashing mad act of bravery without acquiring a halo which adheres afterward; it was fairly certain that a military company, originating with the Chevalier Beaupre, would succeed. And it succeeded. Three days later it was started with the cordial sanction of the fathers and the enthusiasm of the sons. Francois was, of course, the moving spirit and the responsible head, and Francois was hard at work calling back the old lore of his school-days at Saint-Cyr and reading books on tactics and all military subjects.



"My Nephew's Friend Is Welcome to Roanoke House."

"Henry," said Colonel Hampton one morning after breakfast at Roanoke House, "I want to speak to you a moment in my study."

Harry went calmly into the dim, pleasant, old room, with its paneled walls and portraits set into the paneling; he had no fear of what his uncle might say, for he was not merely the young nephew and ward living in his uncle's house—he was the owner of most of the acres which made the plantation a great one. Colonel Hampton considered that in his treatment of Harry, and Harry knew it well enough. Moreover, it was an unspoken secret that Harry or Lucy had the right of strength over weakness in dealing with the head of the house. Obstinacy combined sometimes with weakness, it is true, but yet the two youngsters understood clearly that the colonel was the head only by a graceful fiction. So young Henry Hampton felt no alarm at the quality of his uncle's tone. The colonel sat down in the biggest chair, a chair throne-like in its dignity; he faced the lad and pulled importantly at the end of his mustache.

"This troop of cavalry about organized?" he demanded.

"Well, that's rather a big name for it, Uncle Henry, but it is going like a streak," answered Henry, junior. "We meet again today, and tomorrow I think we shall begin business."

"I approve of it," Colonel Hampton stated.

Harry bowed his head gravely. The colonel went on.

"It is a well-bred and appropriate method of amusement. A gentleman should know something of military affairs. But—ah—the ranking and—ah—arrangements? Such—details are not unlikely with gentlemen of the first families, as you all are—except one—to crystallize into a—later importance. The man who has been the leader of this company of very young men will not unlikely be the man thought of as a leader in—ah—affairs of greater moment to come. May I inquire who is the captain?"

Henry Hampton looked troubled, impatient.

"Why, nobody yet, Uncle Henry. We have not got to that. But, of course, the Chevalier—"

Colonel Hampton interrupted him. "Exactly. I thought so. That is what I wish to avoid. The Chevalier must not be the captain."

The boy caught up the words hotly. "Uncle Henry, he has done it all. We all want him."

"Exactly. But you must not have him. I am surprised at you, Henry! Do you remember that this man is peasant-born? Do you want to be led into battle by a person whose rank is not above that of our own servants?"

"Led into battle!" Young Henry laughed shortly. "Led into a corn field is more like it." And then his glance fired. "Moreover, Uncle Henry, if there were battle in the case, we should all count ourselves lucky to be led by—a hero."

"A hero!" Colonel Hampton sniffed. "A mere French peasant by his own account. Of course, I have—received him, because of your infatuation for him. And—the young man has qualities. He has been a success socially, I will not deny. I am quite surprised by his success. But when it comes to putting him in a position above men of birth, my blood revolts. I request you, Henry, to use your influence against this. I can not endure to have him give you commands. You should be the captain, because your social position has made the enterprise possible. But, yet, if—your misfortune—if some other seems more fit—" A painful color darkened the boy's face and his brows gathered. The colonel went on. "I should make no objection to that. But" again he pulled at the corners of his mustache with solemnity—"I must request you to use your influence absolutely to prevent this parvenu from being placed over you."

Harry Hampton put his hand on the table beside him and lifting himself with that aid stood before his uncle, leaning a little on the table as his lame foot made it necessary, but yet a figure full of decision and dignity.

"And I must refuse absolutely, Uncle Henry, to do anything of the kind. I am not in question. As you say, I have—a misfortune. I shall use what influence I have to see that the Chevalier Beaupre is made captain of the company he has organized and is to educate. This is fitting. I am proud to call him my friend, and I am glad that I am large-minded enough to realize that as large a mind as his is not to be measured by petty standards. If he is a prince or if he is a peasant is quite immaterial, because he is first a very great thing—himself." He turned from the astonished colonel, and with his halting step was gone.

Shortly the young master's horse was ordered and he had left word with Ebenezer, the butler, as he went out, that he would not be home till bedtime, and was off toward Carnifax.

"Francois," he began, finding his friend busy over his papers in that same library, at that same carved mahogany desk, where today lie the packages of old letters—"Francois, I want to speak to you—about something—before our meeting."

"What then? The boy is out of breath. You have been running Black Hawk again, my Henry—that horse will complain of you soon, the strong beast. What is it you are in such a hurry to say that one must race across country so of a good hour of the morning?"

But Henry was too intent to talk nothings. "It is important," he said briefly. "We must have a captain for the company at once, and it must be you."

"Sabre de bois!" smiled Francois radiantly. "The good idea! I can not imagine a fellow more beautiful to be a captain than I. Can you?"

But Henry was altogether serious-minded. "You will consent then?" he threw at him. "I did not think of it till this morning, but I see it should be done at once. We shall all want you, of course, and want nobody else."

Now Henry Hampton, not having thought of the question till this morning, had no right to make this statement in a full round voice of certainty. Yet he knew every man in the company, and he felt in himself the force to answer for them. He answered for them without a hesitation. And with that Francois' laughing face grew grave. He pushed the letters from him and got up and came across to the boy and bent and put his arm around his shoulder as he sat still and stiff. These French ways of his friend pleased Henry immensely, but they also petrified him with embarrassment. Francois was not in the least embarrassed. He patted the broad young shoulder affectionately.

"My good Henry," he said gently. "What a loyal heart—and what a reckless one! How then can you answer for all those messieurs?"

Harry flung up his head and began. "They will—if they do not I shall make them"—but Francois stopped the bold words.

"No," he said quietly—yet with a tone of finality which the other recognized. "That will not be necessary. And the messieurs are my good friends; they will treat me with honor; they will be better to me than I deserve. I know that well." There were so few people in the world who did not, to Francois, seem his good friends. "But, my Henry, I will not be the captain. I have thought of that, if you have not. Look here."

He swung to the desk and slipped out a drawer, and had a long folded paper in his hands. He flapped it open before Harry's eyes. It was a formal notice to Mr. Henry Hampton, junior, that the Jefferson troop of Virginia had elected him as its captain.

Harry flushed violently and his mouth quivered with pleasure, with nervousness, with unhappiness. The other watched him eagerly. All this affair of the troop he had done to give pleasure to Harry Hampton, his friend. It was the only way in which the lame boy could be on equal terms with the other boys, and Francois had determined from the first that every joy which could be gleaned out of it he should have. To be the captain ought to be a joy.

"I!" Harry cried and then was silent—and then spoke sorrowfully. "But—it can not be!"

"Can not be?" demanded Francois. "Why not?"

There was a moment's silence and with a painful effort the words came. "My—misfortune. I am lame."

And Francois cried out, "Henry—all that is nonsense! What of it? It is a thing you do as well as the best—riding. Who has such a seat, such hands as you? Why not then, I demand?" And went on. "It is settled. I have talked to them all—see the signatures. You are the captain, my Henry—and I am your right hand and your left hand—yes and your feet, too, whenever you need me."

"But," said Harry, dazed, "it is really your place; don't you want to be captain?" he shot at the other boyishly.

And with that Francois' arm was about his shoulder again as the two stood together, and Francois was laughing. "But yes," he said. "I should like it. That is a secret." His face was brilliant with laughter. "You only may know, my Henry, that I am vain—ah, very vain," he repeated sadly. "Never tell it. I love titles and honors and importance. I like to be called Chevalier—though indeed that is my right," he added with a quick touch of dignity. "And I should like very much to be captain of this company of fine young men, the flowers—does one say?—of the South. But it is not best." He held up his forefinger and looked enormously worldly-wise. "No. You would not mind; the young messieurs would not mind, perhaps—but the fathers—ah, the fathers!" He threw back his head and gazed at the ceiling with eyes of horror. Then with a start and a hand flung out, "And the mothers! Mon Dieu! But the mothers, Henry! They would make—what you call it—a h—l of a time, is it not?"

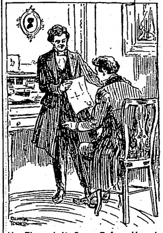
Harry roared with joy at the terrified whisper. "But I have neither father nor mother," he suggested.

"Ah, Henry," argued Francois with deep satisfaction in his tone, "that makes you so suitable."

"Suitable!" inquired Henry.

"But yes, my friend. It kills jealousy. All is grist, one says, that comes to your mill. All is fathers, all is mothers to the poor orphan—and besides that, there is Monsieur the Colonel. One sees that the uncle of the captain will be contented. And whom should I wish to content but my first host, my first benefactor in this land? I believe, indeed, he would be displeased if I should take the place. I believe he is not satisfied of my birth."

And beneath the nonsense of Francois, Henry could but acknowledge the clear-sighted logic. So it happened that Henry Hampton became captain of the Jefferson Troop, to the entire satisfaction of all concerned.



He Flapped It Open Before Harry's Eyes.

My Lady's Mirror.

Exercise is a splendid skin tonic. A brisk walk, no matter if in the rain, will freshen the complexion, even as it freshens the flowers, and a simple aperient will do wonders for a muddy skin. It remains for all women to preserve such beauty as they have and to cure the defects which are peculiar to them or that time was wrought. Every skin is different and must be treated accordingly, and it takes a reasoning woman to experiment carefully and find out the proper method of treatment for her skin.

Most women, whether they be fleshy or thin, walk far too little. The woman who tends to be fleshy should walk for at least an hour every day, and do it regularly and systematically. As she gets accustomed to the exercise she should increase the number of miles she walks a day until she is doing five miles.—Exchange.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

The last weeks Clear Brook Journal has the cut of the popular peoples candidate Samuel G Iverson by the side of an add, reading "Put in your order for dynamite before to late." A very good suggestion Bro. Anderson.

There would have been no question about Sam Iverson defeating Governor Eberhart for the republican nomination if the other candidates had stayed out of the fight, and we are of the opinion that the people will eliminate the other ones at the election and give him votes enough to land the nomination.

This is about the time of year that the professional city type writer begins to pound out long winded copy in the interest of some candidate for state office and sends it out to the country newspapers for publication, Send it along we have no kick coming, as it comes handy to use as scratch paper around the office, and to start the fire in the morning.

We noticed a paid advertisement in the last issue of the T. R. F. News Press, taken from Bob Dunn's Princeton Union, booming D. P. O'Neill for the State Senate. It seems queer that a man who has twice represented this district in the legislature has to go outside of it to get newspaper support. But the trouble with Dan was that he was a good man for the other fellows, especially the twin cities, and we may expect to soon hear that he has the solid support of all the Daily papers down there, tearing their hair for his re election.

It is now a certainty that the Electric Railway line will be completed and in running order 20 miles east of Thief River Falls by August 1st. The line is to be of standard width and the rails of at least 75 lbs weight to the foot. Ordinary freight cars will be used for the transportation of grain and transfered onto the mainlines of railways at Thief River Falls. The stock holders will soon begin to realize dividends on their investments in this line as the Eleven Towns can produce the grain to haul and the acreage, will soon be doubled, with a reliable home market for our produce. Daniel Shaw informs us that stock can still be had in the first 20 miles of the line, but is being rapidly taken up.

A meeting of a number of anti-Eberhart Republicans was held in Minneapolis February 4th and they decided to call a state conference of Republicans to recommend a candidate for governor. The main object of those who attended is to unite on one candidate against Eberhart. It is believed that when the candidate is selected the other rivals of Gov Eberhart will withdraw from the race. But this is by no means certain. The state conference will be held March 19 and county mass conventions to elect delegates to the conference will be held March 14.—Norman County Index.

No, none of them will withdraw, but that meeting will undoubtedly make three or four more of the opinion that they are so popular that they will also file so as to mix up the opposition to Eberhart more than ever. The best way to do is to sit down and let the democrats put Eberhart out of business in November.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate. I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON,
Thief River Falls, Minn.

FINE TRIBUTE FROM A FRIEND.

(Graceville Enterprise.)

In view of the prominence in which Mr. Iverson's announcement has placed him, as a possible governor of the state, it is interesting to know in what estimation he is held by those who were confreres of his while in the legislature, where he had an opportunity to make the laws of the state. Hon. R. A. Costello of this place was a member of the legislature of 1887, in which Mr. Iverson also had a seat, and he is liberal in praise of Iverson as a man and as a legislator. He says: "There was never a measure brought up involving in any way the welfare of the people of the state in which Sam Iverson was not on the right side, the side of the people, and I and all his fellow members had the highest esteem and admiration for his integrity and constructive statesmanship." When a man of the standing and reputation of R. A. Costello gives such unreserved tribute to any man it is proof positive that he is deserving of the highest position in the gift of the state and is the caliber of man to whom the destinies of this great commonwealth might well be entrusted.

NEXT GOVERNOR FROM FILLMORE.

(Luverne Journal.)

The principal thing that is worrying Ed Smith and Adolph O. Eberhart just now is the possibility that the anti-Eberhart forces will get together behind Sam Iverson. If that is so Fillmore county will furnish the next governor of Minnesota, term beginning Jan. 1, 1916; and Blue Earth county will NOT furnish the next United States senator from Minnesota.

LAW ENFORCEMENT SUPREME.

(Thief River Falls News-Press.)

Samuel G. Iverson, the genial and efficient state auditor, has formally announced his candidacy for the gubernatorial nomination. Mr. Iverson in his statement takes a strong stand in favor of law enforcement and retrenchment, and is diametrically opposed to the present executive's ideas in the matter of the creation of more boards for the transaction of the state's business. The state auditor is in favor of reducing the number of these barnacles and placing the state's business on a strictly business footing. He is also opposed to what he terms the "invisible government," and is in favor of all of the business of the state being transacted in the open, that the people may be fully informed at all times of just what is going on.

The statement of the auditor in connection with his gubernatorial aspirations is withal a strong one, and is in keeping with his past in the conduct of the affairs of the auditor's office; which have always been up to a high standard of efficiency in the matter of strict business principles.

The state auditor is a Norwegian, has been in public life for the past quarter of a century, and has probably the largest speaking acquaintance of any man in the state. His formal announcement will be met with a great deal of favor in all parts of the state, but more particularly in Northern Minnesota and the Red River valley, where he has an exceptionally strong following. His announcement will also have the effect of putting the machine forces on their mettle, and from now on we may expect to see the Smith-Eberhart crowd getting busy.

HOME PAPER NOMINATES IVERSON.

(Rushford Star-Republican.)

There seems to be a statewide demand that Minnesota's next governor shall be a man who will give the state a common sense, businesslike administration, starting right out with efficiency and economy in the executive's office, and down through every department. The time is here when the maintenance of countless state boards and commissions and creation of new ones, with their myriad of inspectors, are looked upon as superfluous and unnecessary. The Star-Republican would endorse any good strong man for governor, but our preference is Sam G. Iverson, the present state auditor. We know he is abundantly qualified in every way. No one has a better and clearer public record. As governor he would be the chief executive in fact, free from insidious influences. His conduct as auditor has been progressive, firm and impartial. Therefore, we rise to nominate Mr. Iverson, feeling that all about us we are backed by hundreds of admirers of the former Rushford boy, whose career we are justly proud of.

Coming.

"Have you any unanimity in your family, Mrs. Jobbs?"

"Not yet, ma'am, but we'll ketch it. We get everything that's a-goin'."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

RECAST POLITICAL CHESSBOARD.

(Hastings Gazette.)

The formal announcement of S. G. Iverson, state auditor, that he is a candidate for the Republican nomination as governor, although not unexpected, implies a recasting of the political chessboard in Minnesota during the coming year. It means much, not only to aspirants for the same position, but also to those seeking preferment in other capacities all along the line. Mr. Iverson is an able, competent man, with experience attained in continuous public service since 1881.

THE LOCAL NEWS

T. S. JACOBSON licensed auctioneer, Highlanding, Minn. Prompt attention given to auction sales of farm property.

Subscribe for The Sunbeam. Pay up your back Subscription.

Mrs. Joe LaCount was visiting Mrs. Hunt, at Sunbeam to day.

Narveson Bros, are cutting up our summer's fire wood to day.

Owing to being rushed with other work our local columns are rather light this week.

The Mike Kolski band furnished the music for the big ball at Mavie last Saturday evening.

Henry Bost had the misfortune to lose one of his horses this morning, which is quite a serious loss to him.

Narveson Bros. and Clifford Shosten finished filling the Highlanding Creamery ice house with a first class article of ice this week.

The Sunbeam editor has been putting up ice this week, so as to have something to cool off with when the campaign gets too hot.

There will be a big masquer' ade ball at P. L. Wojnarowski's in Hickory Feb. 28th, Section 8. You can buy your masks there.

Quite a large number from up this way attended the ball at P. L. Wajnarowski's on last Sat' urday evening. and report a fine time.

C. L. Clark drove down to Thief River Falls Tuesday after a load of goods for the P. L. Halverson Highlanding store. He reports very bad roads.

Mrs. Bertha Narveson will sell off her stock and farm machinery at public auction, and rent out her farm for this season,

Remember the big auction sale of P. L. Wajnarowski, which will be held on Section 8, town of Hickory next Wednesday, Feb-25th.

As Minnesota has defeated about all the southern states on corn raising it would be a good idea for them to challenge us on bananas and peanuts.

There seems to be the usual number of auction sales being held this winter, and the machinery and stock sold are bringing fairly good prices.

The ice on the Red Lake River is now frozen about two feet thick, so we are in no danger of an ice famine in northern Minnesota this year.

Henry Arndt took a load of barley down to M. E. Hyland's feed mill to day to have it ground into pig feed, Hank says it does not trouble his horses to grind their own oats.

The roads are in rather poor condition for hauling loads to and from Thief River Falls, but they will soon be better, as the people have ceased to wait for each other to break out the roads and have all taken a start at it,

Remember that if you want to buy horses, cows, young stock, or farm machinery, you should attend the big auction sale on sec. 8, town of Hickory, next Wednesday, February 25th, as Mr. Wojnarowski has a big lot of property to sell.

There was a very nice crowd attended the dance at the Eric Hall, on last Saturday evening, and a very pleasant time was enjoyed by all. The music was nothing to brag about, although it was low, and sweet, and those at the rear of the hall danced by guess.

THE MOST POPULAR OFFICIAL.

(Argyle Banner.)

Mr. Iverson has been state auditor for ten years and has served the state in other capacities prior to that time. His candidacy for governor will no doubt cause some of the other aspirants for the office to sweat a little, as Mr. Iverson is probably the most popular official of the state and a man who is known by sight by more people than any other man in the state.

Beau Brummel's Dress.

Evidently we must not believe all that we have read of Beau Brummel. There were stories that he appeared in "a dove colored coat and white satin inexpressibles;" that it took two artists to make his gloves, a special expert being assigned to the thumbs, and that he had three hairdressers who specialized, so to speak, on the different parts of his head. All these stories, it seems, are fiction, according to Leon H. Vincent's "Dandies and Men of Letters:"

"Simplicity and unobtrusive elegance were his ideals. To attract notice by conspicuousness in dress was in his opinion the most mortifying experience that a gentleman could have. Byron told Leigh Hunt that there was nothing remarkable in Brummel's dress except a certain exquisite propriety. From which it may be inferred that his reforms were of a sensible sort."

Arsenic.

Excepting possibly the bichloride of mercury, few toxic substances are so common as arsenic, for the arsenates and arsenites are not only much used in medicine, but are likely to be encountered in commercial substances, wallpaper, dyestuffs, etc. Arsenic has been known since ancient times. The word means masculine or powerful. In the sixteenth century it was used for homicidal purposes in the form of aqua tofana and in literature has been the most celebrated of poisons. Although considered one of the most powerful poisons, it is less so in its ordinary forms than potassium cyanide and the alkaloids, though in combination with hydrogen it becomes one of the deadliest substances known, the slightest whiff of the gas being sufficient to insure death. In the common form, the trioxide or "white arsenic," one or two grains cause death.—Boston Herald.

Great Poets and a Little Girl.

James Russell Lowell used to walk along the gravel paths of his beautiful garden in Cambridge, Mass., hand in hand with a bright little girl, who was his neighbor, and discoursed with her upon fairies, paper dolls, roses and other important subjects. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, a neighbor of Lowell's and of the little girl's, who wore a velvet coat and a big tie, was also her intimate friend. He used to tell her wonderful stories of ancient heroes and many other marvelous things. It was natural that the little girl should resolve even then to become a writer, and first of all a poet, for it was as a poet that the novelist, Eleanor Hallowell Abbott, first achieved recognition.—Century.

WHERE HAS THE MONEY GONE?

(Fergus Falls Journal.)

If the candidacy of Samuel G. Iverson for governor does nothing more than call attention to the extravagance in the state government it will have been worth while. There is no man in the state who is better posted as to what has become of the money which the state has disbursed for the past twenty years than Iverson, because he is the man who has paid it out, and he knows where it has gone and what it has gone for. The steady increase in the tax rate for the past ten years, in spite of the great increase in the assessed valuation of the state, shows how vastly the public expenditures have increased, but the tax rate does not tell all. In spite of the increase of the tax rate a large number of indirect taxes have been levied which the people have paid without knowing what they were doing.

DEVOTE TIME, TALENT AND ENERGY.

(Eden Valley Journal.)

There is not a public man in Minnesota more widely known than Mr. Iverson. There are few men who have as many warm personal and political friends in the state.

He has been in public office practically all his life and he never flinched his duty nor crossed a friend. He is a competent auditor. If the fates and the voters so decree he would be no less efficient and competent a governor.

If he should secure the nomination and election he would give the people of Minnesota his time, his talent and his energy.

TIME FOR PEOPLE'S UPRISING.

(Willmar Journal.)

Samuel G. Iverson, at present state auditor, tells us he is a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor.

Iverson has been in state politics a good many years and perhaps knows the game about as well as some others and we shouldn't be sorry to see him "hand 'em a few."

Iverson declares he is for "economy and law enforcement," and God knows if there is anything needed in Minnesota it is both, and needed bad. It is nearly time there was an uprising against the things that have been rampant all over this state.

BACKACHE-RHEUMATISM QUICKLY VANISHES

Even Most Chronic Sufferers Find Relief From Few Doses of Croxone.

Croxone soon relieves such conditions because it reaches the very roots of the disease. It soaks right into the stopped-up, inactive kidneys, through the walls and linings; cleans out the little filtering cells and glands; neutralizes and dissolves the poisonous uric acid substances that lodge in the joints and muscles to scratch and irritate and cause rheumatism; heals the inflamed membranes of the bladder, and cleans out and strengthens the stopped-up, lifeless kidneys so they can filter and sift all the poisons from the blood, and drive it out of the system.

So sure, so positive, so quick and lasting, are the results obtained from the use of Croxone, that three doses a day for a few days are often all that is required to end the worst backache, regulate the most annoying bladder disorders, and overcome the numerous other similar conditions.

Croxone is so prepared that it is practically impossible to take it without results.

An original package costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if Croxone fails to give desired results, regardless of how old you are, how long you have suffered, or what else has failed.—Adv.

ALL THINGS IN READINESS

Jethro's Preparations, as He Understood, Left Simply Nothing That Ceremony Could Require.

Governor Tener of Pennsylvania, the new president of the National league, said at a baseball banquet in New York:

"Success in baseball depends on preparation, on training. They who fail in baseball have either been slack in their preparation, or else they have prepared, like Jethro Higgins of Conshohocken, in the wrong way.

"The minister, you know, came to Jethro's house one afternoon to a christening party—he was to christen Jethro's little son, Jeth, Jr.

"'Jethro,' said the minister, solemnly, taking his host aside before the ceremony; 'Jethro, are you prepared for this solemn event?'

"'Oh, yes, indeed, doctor,' Jethro beamed. 'I've got two hams, three gallons of ice cream, pickles, cake—'

"'No, no, Jethro,' said the minister, with a smile. 'No, no, my friend. I mean spiritually prepared.'

"'Well, I guess yes! Two demijohns of whisky and three cases of beer!' Jethro cried in triumph."

Mechanical Calculator.

A Swedish inventor has designed an apparatus for counting money and sorting the pieces into specified quantities. In the first place, money of various denominations is put into the machine and separated according to value, these being sent into various tubes. When in the tubes the coins can be taken out in lots of ten, twenty, fifty or one hundred pieces, at the will of the operator. The apparatus is capable of separating, counting and dividing in the lots mentioned above 72,000 pieces in an hour. One machine under one operator is able to accomplish in one day as much counting as could be done by fifty most experienced bank cashiers.—Northern Weekly Gazette.

SCHOOL TEACHERS.

Also Have Things to Learn.

"For many years I had used coffee and refused to be convinced of its bad effect upon the human system," writes a veteran school teacher.

"Ten years ago I was obliged to give up my much-loved work in the public schools after years of continuous labor. I had developed a well defined case of chronic coffee poisoning.

"The troubles were constipation, flutterings of the heart, a thumping in the top of my head, and various parts of my body, twitching of my limbs, shaking of my head and, at times after exertion, a general "gone" feeling, with a toper's desire for very strong coffee. I was a nervous wreck for years.

"A short time ago friends came to visit us and they brought a package of Postum with them, and urged me to try it. I was prejudiced because some years back I had drunk a cup of weak, tasteless stuff called Postum which I did not like at all.

"This time, however, my friends made the Postum according to directions on the package, and it won me. Soon I found myself improving in a most decided fashion.

"The odor of boiling coffee no longer tempts me. I am so greatly benefited by Postum that if I continue to improve as I am now, I'll begin to think I have found the Fountain of Perpetual Youth. This is no fancy letter but stubborn facts which I am glad to make known."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of "The Road to Wellville."

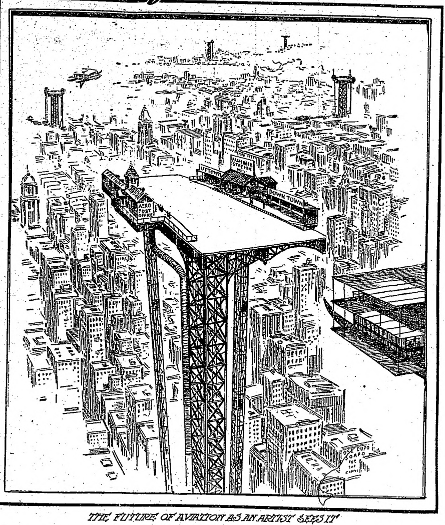
Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

The FUTURE of AVIATION



THE FUTURE OF AVIATION AS AN ARTIST SEES IT

TEN years ago, among the sand dunes of North Carolina, a slim, gaunt, intense Ohioan stretched himself downward on a narrow ledge surmounted by yards of outstretched muslin, a compact, powerful little engine purred at his heels, and a giant, inanimate thing of spruce and cloth swept like a falcon out over that silent, sea coast desert. A little telegraph office at Kitty Hawk, N. C., an hour later startles a world with the laconism: "The Wright brothers have flown." It was the word civilization had awaited hundreds of years. For the dream of flying is as old as civilization.

A decade has passed since man "sprouted his wings." The world has watched him from his first weak, fitful bounds from mother earth for brief seconds aloft to his hours and even a day in steady sustained flight. It has ceased to marvel, and it expectantly has come to look to the future—to wonder "what next." Ten years ago Wilbur Wright flew at Kitty Hawk for 59 seconds. Today the record for sustained flight is 14 hours and 1,300 miles.

In ten years the aeroplane has made more rapid strides than did the automobile. More than a thousand men, with a fair percentage of women, today are driving aeroplanes in all parts of the world. The first successful flight of the Wrights has almost been forgotten so great has been the progress of the aeroplane and the increase in the number of aviators.

The English channel has been crossed and recrossed by one, two and three persons in an aeroplane, aviators have swept up and over the fearsome peaks and abysses of the Alps; whole continents have been crossed in aviation races; the United States has been spanned by an American, who lost his life in a comparatively trivial exhibition feat. But the present asks: "Well, what of the future? What will these birdmen be doing ten years from now?"

From the stage of pure amusement, the period when aviation was alone for the daring, those who were counted foolhardy and the show people of the air, flying is working toward a commercial stabilization. The men who cling to aviation today are those with ideas of making it a recognized asset of commerce. The era of aerial transportation is upon us.

They will have crossed the Atlantic ocean, penetrated the dismal jungles of Africa, scanned the tropical fever-ridden areas of the Amazon, brought back the word from the remote regions of ice and snow? Perhaps. But, greater still, aeroplanes will be a proven adjunct of commerce. Our mails will be shot to almost inaccessible points through the air. The trackwalker of the great railroad system will give way to the critical eyes of a man-bird sweeping swiftly along the ribbons of steel. Through tangled wood and over swollen river the telegraph and telephone lineman will skim with his vision focused on narrow strands of copper wire. Far into Alaska, reached today only by toiling dog train and intense suffering, will go the aviator with mail supplies and even luxuries. These are but a few of the suggestions of aeronautical optimists.

The enormous death rate of aviation in proportion to the number of persons who have taken it up would indicate to the layman that the conquest of the air is far from complete. But such strides have been made in the last few years that, despite the death toll, the results have been more than encouraging. There are aviators flying today who, seemingly, are almost as safe in the air as if on land or on the water. After all, most of the deaths of aviators have been due to accidents which resulted from carelessness on the part of some one, either the flyer himself or his mechanician.

So confident are aviation experts that the aeroplane has been developed to a stage where it can be used in every day business that many of them are attempting to adapt it as a carrier of the mails. Many of the Alaskan wastes and sparsely settled regions of the west could be traversed in hours where now it requires days.

The French government was the first to apply the aeroplane to the practical delivery of the mails. The aeroplane has given a fast mail service in parts of desert Africa. Henry Woodhouse, an expert on things aeronautical and editor of Flying, a magazine devoted entirely to the airmen, recently predicted wonderful progress in the aeropost.

"Eact month," he wrote, "something happens to emphasize more forcefully the value of the aeroplane for mail carrying, and whereas it is usually demonstrated in places where there is an efficient mail-carrying service—by the ordinary methods—it is made more and more evident that aeroplane mail service will be a boon to such places as Arizona, Colorado, Texas, New Mexico, Nevada, Alaska, the Philippines, Canada and South and Central America.

"The conquest of the desert by aeroplane is complete. Traveling a mile a minute, it crosses from oasis to distant habitation in a few hours. The French government in the last six months has employed twoscore of aeroplanes to carry mail, provisions and passengers from Casa Blanca, the port, to different points along and across the desert. With this aerial service it has been found that intercommunication and transportation between points on the desert is faster than in certain places in Europe and America. The aeroplane has shown that it is to become a potential factor in solving the problems of advancing civilization in Morocco, Algeria, Tripolitania, Congo, the Soudan and in Zambesi.

"It already has saved thousands of lives in the French campaign in Morocco and Italian campaign in Tripolitania—for which it has never received credit from the world at large—by always watching the movements of the enemy, thus avoiding those unpleasant surprises which have crimsoned the pages of the history of the conquest of Africa.

"Other demonstrations have been given practically each day of the last year. Every one of the flights of Garros, Brindejonc de Moulinais, Guillaux, Bider and the threescore of other airmen, who make flights of from 500 to 1,300 miles a day, are forceful demonstrations of the increased swiftness in mail carrying which the aeroplane affords."

Advocates of the aeropost for Alaska point out that last September United States army engineers traveled half way across Alaska to a point two degrees from the arctic circle—traversing altogether about 826 miles—in 19 days. The aeropost proponents say any of the well-known cross-country aeroplane drivers of today could have accomplished the trip, with or without mail, in one day and many others could do it in three days at most.

United States government officials have indicated their willingness to help in developing the aeroplane for the mail service. Postmaster General A. S. Burleson, in a recent letter to Woodhouse, showed his desire to encourage the aeropost advocates as much as he can.

"I fully realize," he wrote, "the necessity of keeping abreast of the needs of the postal service for the rapid transmission of mail and of using every possible facility to this end. In line with this conviction the department is ready at all times to give careful study and consideration to such new means of transportation as may be discovered and developed. We have repeatedly given official aid to aviation meets throughout the country by establishing special postal stations and authorizing the transportation of mail temporarily by aeroplane.

"These activities, of course, are recognized as experimental, but I am persuaded that the time is rapidly approaching when the department will be called upon to give serious consideration to the feasibility of aerial mail transportation. The adoption of such means, however, can only be brought about after it is demonstrated they can be furnished and maintained within the proper limits of economy."

That no future war will be fought without the aid of the aero scout is a foregone conclusion. This is evidenced by the invaluable aid the aeroplane gave the French and Italians in their recent troubles in Morocco and Tripoli and to the various armies engaged in the recent warfare in the Balkans. United States army aviators every day now are scouting along the Mexican border watching over the huge army camp in which men are living every day on the chance trouble with Mexico may start at any time.

Increase is being made in aeroplane equipment of the world's armies every week. France leads in the number of aeroplanes. These total more than 265, and the French have one aeroplane for the navy.

Russia has 116 army aeroplanes and Germany has 46. Japan has 10, Great Britain has about 30, Italy has 25 and the United States about 25. England has six for the navy, and the United States, Japan and Italy have four each. Russia has one and Germany two.

Cross-country flights in 1912 and 1913 show conclusively aeroplanes can be relied upon to cover great distances at high speed. The greatest flight in 1912 was that of Andreadi, who, in a Nieuport machine, flew from Sebastopol to St. Petersburg, 1,670 miles. He took 25 days for the trip.

Great things are ahead of the aeroplane. A prize of $50,000 has been offered for the first flight across the Atlantic ocean. Next year or the year after some venturesome aviator, using a hydroaeroplane, probably will have attempted to fly from England to America or from America to England, and the success of the venture would not be surprising.

Two things are certain: The aeroplane has come to stay as a war agent, and it will develop into the best agent for the cross-continent and cross-mountain transportation and delivery of the mails.

There also are possibilities in the transportation of passengers, the establishment of aerial ferries and the inspection of long sections of railroads. Already it is being utilized by telegraph line inspectors in remote sections of the far west.

It is Editor Woodhouse who points out that railroad inspectors could cover more ground and make better and quicker reports by the use of the aeroplane.

"Using an aeroplane," he declares, "inspectors can inspect the road at a speed of between 40 and 70 miles an hour. By using moving picture machines an inspector can photograph the line at the rate of 50 miles an hour, and allowing six hours of traveling to each day he can in three days present to the executive officers of a railroad a film showing the detailed conditions of 1,000 miles of road, which the officials can go over at their meeting and know the exact state of the road and the land adjoining the road.

"As was shown by the experiences of C. P. Rodgers and Robert Fowler in their trips across the continent, rails offer certain advantages over broken country for landing on and starting from. An aeroplane having wide roller wheels finds the rail an every-ready platform to land on and start from.

"A railroad considered the matter of using aeroplanes a year or so ago, but they were deterred from employing them by the excessive cost of securing competent aviators to operate them. At that time competent aviators were still drawing large incomes from exhibition flying, and as that particular railroad which was willing to consider the employment of aeroplanes found that it required 12 aeroplanes for the purpose, the salary item became too excessive to be practical.

"But now that competent aviators can be had at from $50 to $100 a week, and almost any intelligent mechanic can be trained to operate the kind of machine needed for railway surveying, the proposition assumes a practical aspect and there is no doubt that railroads will readily see the advantages of using aeroplanes for this particular purpose."

Editor Woodhouse, like many other aviation experts, believes it will be only a question of time when the aeroplane will be developed for use in connection with the revenue cutter service, irrigation service, life saving and lighthouse service and in the bureaus of fisheries, forestry and gological survey of the national government. South and Central America are as yet practically virgin territories for the development of aerial navigation.

Aviation experts are engaged in devising the best way to make an aeronautical map of the world. Tremendous increase in air navigation, combined with the widening radius of dirigibles, crossing countries, continents and even seas, as they have, has made the necessity for the aeronautical map imperative.

The need of well trained, capable young men to take up aviation is pointed out by Woodhouse, who believes, with President Richard C. Maclaurin of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, that it is a duty on the part of educational institutions to provide instruction in aeronautics.

"Aerial flight of today," Dr. Maclaurin says, "is either an engine of war or an exciting amusement. Its greatest use at present is for pleasure, but before it can be very greatly developed it must be freed from its more serious dangers.

"The men who must see to making reasonably safe the sport of flying must be trained engineers and men of science, and such men are produced in the higher technical schools and colleges. It is for such reasons that the Massachusetts Institute of Technology now makes official a line of work that heretofore has been possible only as an adjunct to other courses."

And so aviation as a science stands. Men in every walk of scientific endeavor are trying to improve it. The nations of the world are spending $89,000,000 this year to forward the progress of aviation. With expenditures increasing every year wonderful things can be expected in the next decade. In the meantime constructive geniuses like Orville Wright and Glenn H. Curtiss are working in secret to improve the aeroplane, and flying geniuses are working in public to show it to the world.

The Wrights, Wilbur and Orville, were the first to demonstrate that a heavier-than-air machine could be made to fly. Before them, for many generations, men had tried to solve the problem of aerial navigation, but the spherical balloon up to 1903 practically had been the only air craft that could be relied upon to carry passengers.

Some of those pioneers in the search for flying honors previous to the success of the Wright brothers are: Prof. Samuel P. Langley, one time secretary of the Smithsonian institution in Washington; Sir Hiram Maxim; M. Clement Ader, who was killed during his experiments; Otto Lillienthal, a German; Octave Chanute, civil engineer; Percy Pilcher of England, killed when experimenting; Prof. John J. Montgomery of California, and many others.

DIZZY, HEADACHY, SICK, "CASCARETS"

Gently cleanse your liver and sluggish bowels while you sleep.

Get a 10-cent box.

Sick headache, biliousness, dizziness, coated tongue, foul taste and foul breath—always trace them to torpid liver; delayed, fermenting food in the bowels or sour, gassy stomach.

Poisonous matter clogged in the intestines, instead of being cast out of the system is re-absorbed into the blood. When this poison reaches the delicate brain tissue it causes congestion and that dull, throbbing, sickening headache.

Cascarets immediately cleanse the stomach, remove the sour, undigested food and foul gases, take the excess bile from the liver and carry out all the constipated waste matter and poisons in the bowels.

A Cascaret to-night will surely straighten you out by morning. They work while you sleep—a 10-cent box from your druggist means your head clear, stomach sweet and your liver and bowels regular for months.—Adv.

WOMAN WOULD NOT GIVE UP

Though Sick and Suffering; At Last Found Help in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Richmond, Pa.—"When I started taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I was in a dreadfully rundown state of health, had internal troubles, and was so extremely nervous and prostrated that if I had given in to my feelings I would have been in bed. As it was I had hardly strength at times to be on my feet and what I did do was by a great effort. I could not sleep at night and of course felt very bad in the morning, and had a steady headache.

"After taking the second bottle I noticed that the headache was not so bad, I rested better, and my nerves were stronger. I continued its use until it made a new woman of me, and now I can hardly realize that I am able to do so much as I do. Whenever I know any woman in need of a good medicine I highly praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. FRANK CLARK, 3146 N. Tulip St., Richmond, Pa.

Wealth in Spitzbergen.

Geological surveys of parts of the Spitsbergen show that there are immense deposits of superior coal in various places, and interested individuals and companies alike are planning to tap these resources and bring them upon the highway of international trade. Not many years ago Spitzbergen was an unknown land and for many years it was a resort only for whalers, shoremen and bandits. Various scientific expeditions have returned from time to time with valuable and interesting information. It is now apparent that in spite of the ice, cold and fog, Spitzbergen is a land fraught with many commercial possibilities. The coal is practically all on the surface and deep mining is unnecessary.

ECZEMA SPREAD OVER BODY

Roxbury, Ohio.—"When my little boy was two weeks old he began breaking out on his cheeks. The eczema began just with pimples and they seemed to itch so badly he would scratch his face and cause a matter to run. Wherever that matter would touch it would cause another pimple until it spread all over his body. It caused disfigurement while it lasted. He had fifteen places on one arm and his head had several. The deepest places on his cheeks were as large as a silver dollar on each side. He was so restless at night we had to put mittens on him to keep him from scratching them with his finger nails. If he got a little too warm at night it seemed to hurt badly.

"We tried a treatment and he didn't get any better. He had the eczema about three weeks when we began using Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I bathed him at night with the Cuticura Soap and spread the Cuticura Ointment on and the eczema left." (Signed) Mrs. John White, Mar. 19 1913.

Prosperity Communistic.

A man cannot prosper in any honest business without benefiting the community as well as himself. For he cannot induce men to deal with him without offering them an advantage; and, taking all the transactions of life together, the advantages which men offer to others must, on the whole, be equal to those which they receive themselves.

Doing business, therefore, is a very effectual and extended mode of doing good; and the fortune which is acquired in doing it is, in a very important sense, the measure and index of the good done.—Jacob Abbott.

Onion as Medicine.

A northern scientist now comes forward to defend the onion, which, he says, is a real specific for colds. All one has to do when his eyes begin to water and his nose to run, is to eat onions, and the trouble will go away. Of course, his friends will go away, too, at least temporarily, but that does not argue that the onion isn't good medicine.

SAYS HOG COLERA CAN BE ERADICATED

AUTHORITY TELLS STATE BREEDERS HOW TO FREE HERDS OF PEST.

DEMONSTRATIONS ARE GIVEN

Six Swine Vaccinated With Serum to Explain Methods—Wisconsin Expert Shows How Immense Profits May Be Made.

Minneapolis.—That a concerted campaign can eradicate hog cholera in Minnesota just as it has been wiped out of the hog pens at the University of Minnesota farm, thus saving the farmers thousands of dollars annually, was the declaration of Dr. H. Preston Hoskins, in charge of the farm serum plant, who spoke before a meeting of the Minnesota Swine Breeders association and the Minnesota Livestock Breeders' association.

Demonstration Is Given.

Six young hogs were "vaccinated" by Dr. Hoskins to show visiting delegates the proper way to prevent cholera in their herds. The "vaccination" has been in progress annually at the university form and Dr. Hoskins related how for two years there had not been a single case in the herd at the farm, which at times has numbered 150 hogs.

"Hog cholera has been prevalent all around us," Dr. Hoskins said. "The herd at the farm was placed in a position to be contaminated in many ways, but through 'vaccination' we kept the herd free of the disease.

"There are just three things needed to eradicate this disease in Minnesota—men, money and serum. When these three agents can work harmoniously for one end, then hog cholera will be a thing of the past."

Wisconsin Results Cited.

Professor D. H. Otis of the farm management department of the University of Wisconsin told the result of a careful study of twenty farms in Wisconsin, ten of which were selected at random and the other ten chosen because they were well managed and well stocked. The capital invested on the average in the poorer farms, he said, was $20,000; the capital invested in the better farms was $30,000 each. The expenses on the selected farms was about 100 per cent more than the expenses on the poorer farms, but the receipts from the better farms was found to be from 500 to 600 per cent more than the receipts from the others. Professor Otis attributes the better results on the one set of farms to the fact that there was more and better livestock on them.

W. W. Marsh, Waterloo, Iowa, a prominent cattle raiser and member of the International Live Stock Exposition board, told the members that he owed all his success in the cattle industry to Professor T. L. Haecker, head of the department of dairy and animal husbandry of the College of Agriculture.

Boy Won; Didn't Know It.

Canby.—For nearly two months a prize pig at the home of T. J. Canfield at Lake City has been awaiting its new owner, while the DeLaval people have been ahead one brand new separator, all because a boy, still in his teens, down in Yellow Medicine county did not have his name identified with the corn he sent to the Morris exposition. A few days ago, Arnold Thompson, of Canby, a graduate of the Canby state high school last June, sent in the number of his entry tags, asking that his corn be returned. To his surprise, he was informed that his was the corn that had taken first place and sweepstakes in the thirty-ear class at the Morris show, and third place in the ten-ear class. He will receive premiums to the value of over $100.

Former Mayor Being Sued.

Mankato.—Dr. J. W. Andrews, former mayor, has been made defendant in a suit for $10,000 damages by Mrs. M. L. Fallenstein, whose husband, then first assistant chief of the local fire department, was overcome in a fire April 19 last, death resulting the same day. The complaint alleges that the defendant removed the heart and part of one lung from the body of Captain Fallenstein after his death, without the consent of the plaintiff, and retained the same in his office from July 28 to Oct. 20.

GAVE DIAMONDS AS PRESENT

Former Resort Keeper Testifies in Graft Case Against St. Paul Police Department.

St. Paul. — As testified to by Gertrude Shaw, a former resort keeper, who was the closing witness in the St. Paul graft cases, money "split four ways," as Willie Wolff expressed it, was not the only thing paid to the St. Paul police department in return for protection. The Shaw woman testified that she had given Fred Turner, former city detective, a diamond ring two days before Christmas in 1912.

The Shaw woman explained her gift to Turner by saying that she had a habit of giving away diamond rings as Christmas presents and had given away four during the Christmas week named. She said they were not as expensive as the one she had given Turner. On cross examination she said the rings she had given away were not all given to police officers.

The Shaw woman was the last witness examined by the state and the defense has begun the presentation of evidence.

FREE FIGHT ABOARD TRAIN

G. N. Laborers Riot After Drugged Liquor is Administered—Many Are Hurt.

Willmar.—Snow shovelers for the Great Northern, who were being transported from Breckenridge, fairly turned their coach into a shambles when a free-for-all fight was started by men who had been drinking. One of the victims of the riot was taken off the train at Morris, his legs having been broken and his back injured. Seven or eight were put off at this point, four being placed in jail on charges of assault in the second degree and grand larceny.

One of the men in a hospital here was cut by a knife and another may lose the sight of an eye, having been kicked in the face. One of those in jail has been bound over to the grand jury.

It is asserted that four men procured whisky which they drugged and gave to the others. When their victims were in a dazed condition they started in to rob them.

Winona Road Project Indorsed.

Winona.—The annual meeting of the Winona Association of Commerce was held, the principal feature being an address by Frank L. Mulholland, president of the Commerce club of Toledo, Ohio, who took for his theme, "Get Together Men Doing Things Worth While." The program promoted by Donald B. Pritchard, for the construction of eighty additional miles in Winona county of permanent good roads, was indorsed by resolution. Directors chosen to serve for the coming three years were H. E. Blair, Roscoe Horton, Scott Laird and C. M. Morse.

Inquiry at St. Cloud.

St. Cloud.—With an idea of fixing the blame either on the fire department or the system, the city commissioners will make an investigation for the failure of the water pressure at the recent destructive fire here. Whether or not the lack of pressure was caused because of the failure of the pumps or because of a low head of steam will be investigated, as it was stated that it required almost three hours to get sufficient steam for a water pressure that was ample to fight the fire.

Frozen Body Found Hanging.

Winona.—Mrs. Deborah Dowling of St. Charles, aged 63, committed suicide by hanging herself at midnight by a silk scarf in the barn at the rear of her home. She had not been right mentally for some time and had threatened to take her life and all rope had been removed from the house. She arose when all others in the house were asleep. She was missed at 2 o'clock a. m. and her partly frozen body was found in the barn.

Pierz School Building Burns.

Little Falls.—The public school building at Pierz, thirteen miles east of this city, was burned. The cause of the fire is unknown. The loss is $15,000. The school, although public, was taught by Catholic Sisters, and this practice was recently criticized by state school authorities.

Two Killed By Train.

Minneapolis.—Two men were killed and a third had a narrow escape when they stepped in front of an inbound Duluth train on the Great Northern tracks. Lars Gunder Anderson and Lars Gustave Nelson are dead. Carl H. Anderson, brother of Lars Gunder, escaped with a few bruises.

Scarlet Fever at Winona.

Winona.—Owing to an epidemic of scarlet fever which prevailed in Winona in January, H. A. Burns of the state board of health made an investigation. He found there had been nearly fifty cases here, but all widely scattered, and recommended that a nurse be employed and a uniform system for detection and following up of suspects be adopted. Donald B. Pritchard, local health officer, says the disease has been largely stopped in the past week.

FINDS MOTHER; STRANGERS

Youth Placed in Orphanage at Age of Two Had Trouble in Learning Family History.

Winona.—Having been placed in an orphans' home when he was two years old because of the separation of his mother and father at Sioux Falls, S. D., 22 years ago, George H. Ballard came to Winona and, for the first time, greeted his mother, Mrs. William Yetter.

There was no announcement of his coming. Responding to a knock, Mrs. Yetter opened the door. She saw a well-dressed young man. She did not know him.

"Is this Mrs. Yetter?" he asked. She said it was.

"Mother, don't you know me?" he exclaimed.

When Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Tolbert separated, their three children, a boy and two girls, werre placed in an orphans' home. The mother was unable to provide for them. Since then Mrs. Tolbert remarried and has three more children, two daughters and one son, all at home here.

George H. Tolbert was placed in the Sioux Falls institution and remained there two years before he was taken into the family of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Ballard at Watertown, and became their adopted son. He acquired the name of Ballard and received his education.

Five years ago, the young man says, his foster parents told him that his mother was living, although they did not know her name or address.

He inquired at the Sioux Falls orphanage and learned there that one sister was in Connecticut and another at Hartford, S. D. He wrote them. They told him that his father was in Seattle and that an uncle lived at Eau Claire.

Less than a month ago he learned the name and address of his mother and came here at the first opportunity.

JUROR'S EXPLANATION TAKEN

St. Paul Graft Case Resumed After Being Halted by the State.

St. Paul.—The explanation of John H. Buschmann that he was only joking when he told fellow clerks in the railroad office where he is employed that if he were on a jury he never would convict Flanagan or Turner on charges of graft, was accepted by Judge Morrison and the graft trial, delayed for some time, has been resumed.

To the court, Buschman admitted that he had made the statement credited to him, but said it was made when he had been "joshed" by some of his fellow employes. He explained his statement by saying that he was a German and that the clerks in the office had joked him about German juries acquitting the Irish and had told him that German juries were no good. He said that he had answered them in a joking way by declaring that if he was on the jury "he would let the whole bunch go free."

BURNS TO DEATH IN CABIN

Farmer Tries to Get Clothing for Family After Being Routed in Early Fire.

Thief River Falls.—After escaping with his family from a burning log cabin on his claim near Grygia, L. C. Markland, 65 years old, returned for clothing for his wife and sons and burned to death. Only a few charred bones were found among the ruins.

Markland and wife, occupying a bedroom on the ground floor, were awakened about 4 a. m. by smoke and flames. They aroused their two sons, who leaped from upstairs windows. The temperature was 40 degrees below zero and the family was only clothed scantily.

When their father did not return from the burning cabin the sons carried Mrs. Markland to the barn and wrapped here in horse blankets. They then ran barefooted a half mile to a neighbors for aid. Both were exhausted and severely frozen. They will recover.

Insane Man Hangs Self.

Motley.—Imagining that he was being pursued by an armed mob, Will Sams, a farmer who was recently released from the Fergus Falls insane asylum, went to his barn, turned loose one of his horses and hanged himself with a halter rope. He had told friends at different times that armed mobs were hiding in the woods near his home, waiting for an opportunity to shoot him. He barricaded himself in his house and threatened to shoot anyone who approached the place. He leaves a wife and son.

Broken Rails Are Discovered.

Moorhead.—Seven broken rails were discovered on the Northern Pacific railroad between Moorhead and Dilworth, immediately after the North Coast Limited, running eight hours late, had passed over the tracks. The extremely cold temperature and a flat wheel on one of the cars of the train is believed to be the cause of the breaking of the rails. It is regarded as remarkable that a wreck did not occur, but it is believed that the low speed at which the train was run saved it from serious damage.

Game to Be Protected.

The white man is no longer free to shoot elephants at his will and pleasure in French West Africa. The governor has issued severe provisional regulations pending the promulgation of a decree on this subject. Every European who has a regular license to carry arms, and who wishes to hunt elephants, must make a declaration and pay a tax fixed by the district governors, which must not be less than $200. This is only good for one year (or less, if the decree is issued before the lapse of a year), and only entitles the holder to kill two elephants. Every elephant shot in excess of the two must be declared, and paid for at the rate of at least $100 per head, and not more than five in all may be killed in the year. The spoils of an elephant killed in self-defense must be handed over to the district authority.

An Alibi.

"How many times have I told you not to eat pie with a spoon?" asked Mrs. Cumrox.

"Not as many times as you think," replied her husband, humbly. "We don't have anything as plain as pie very often, you know."

Uric Acid Is Slow Poison

Excess uric acid left in the blood by weak kidneys, causes more diseases than any other poison.

Among its effects are backache, headache, dizziness, irritability, nervousness, drowsiness, "blues," rheumatic attacks and urinary disorders. Later effects are dropsy, gravel or heart disease.

If you would avoid uric acid troubles, keep your kidneys healthy. To stimulate and strengthen weak kidneys, use Doan's Kidney Pills—the best recommended special kidney remedy.

GO TO, WESTERN CANADA NOW

The opportunity of securing free homesteads of 160 acres each, and the low priced lands of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, will soon have passed.

Canada offers a hearty welcome to the Settler, to the man with a family looking for a home; to the farmer's son, to the renter, to all who wish to live under better conditions.

Canada's grain yield in 1913 is the talk of the world. Luxuriant Grasses give cheap fodder for large herds; cost of raising and fattening for market is a trifle.

The sum realized for Beef, Butter, Milk and Cheese will pay fifty per cent on the investment.

The Flight of the Princess

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

Nikolai had unfolded his scheme to me as our train ran through the pleasant, fertile plains of Saxony.

"What would deter you, Summers," he said, "is the rank of the persons most intimately concerned. Now to my mind that is the best guarantee of success for our undertaking. You can strike at kings and queens where you cannot with impunity attack those of lower rank. Why? Because these persons, being themselves outside the law, are loath to have recourse to it. We take our lives in our hands, it is true, but we revert to the old conditions when each man was a law unto himself. I think we can succeed just because of the improbability of such an attempt. And we can hold her to heavy ransom for the cause."

"But a princess!" I urged. "Where can we hold her?"

"If once we get her into our automobile," said Nikolai, "no power on earth can hinder us. We take her direct to the old castle that we have rented for the summer; it is two miles from any habitation and escape would be impossible.

"But I admit," he added, meditatively, "that an accomplice within the castle would help us materially." He fell to thinking and would speak no more.

Our plans were as follows: The Princess of Cassel-Wexel was to be married to the Polish Prince Poniatowski. The marriage was viewed with great aversion by the subjects of the tiny principality of eastern Germany, while the princess herself was rumored to cherish no unkindly feeling toward a handsome but impecunious guards officer, whose aspirations were, of course, destined to remain unfulfilled. Possibly, in these days of democracy, the king might in the end have given his consent; but the Polish marriage was necessary in the interests of state, and czar and kaiser had set their hearts on it. So it seemed improbable that anything could avert the approaching nuptials.

But two weeks were to intervene before their consummation. Nikolai's scheme was to obtain admittance to the castle in the guise of an under-servant or of an American chauffeur, the supply of whom, for the many royal automobiles, was constantly beneath the demand. Then, with me as his assistant, we were to entice the princess for a ride, to kidnap her, and to secrete her in our castle, twenty-four miles away, and well within the borders of an unfriendly state, until a ransom could be arranged.

We put up at the little capital town, dominated by the castle of the king of Cassel-Wexel, which seemed entirely to overshadow the narrow streets that engirdle it. In spite of the popular prejudice against the marriage, Hoch Cassel was en fete, and flags, bearing the Russian and German arms, hung from every window. Nevertheless, scraps of conversation that we overheard, contemptuous references to "the Polak," whose carriage driven by magnificent bays, raced through the streets at all hours to the imminent danger of worthy citizens' necks, bore witness to the condition of the public mind.

"A chauffeur and a mechanician!" exclaimed our landlord, when we broached to him the fact that we desired a position. "And Germans born, returning from America to the fatherland? Young men, your fortunes are made. His Highness Prince Rudolph loves all Americans since his return from that country last spring. And he is installing innumerable automobiles in place of his old carriages. Go up to the castle at once and ask for the Herr Chamberlain; he will take you on. Oh, the salary is liberal; two marks a day and everything found."

That morning we succeeded in obtaining an interview with the Chamberlain. Both of us were thoroughly proficient in the running of automobiles and we were immediately assigned positions in the royal stables—Nikolai as a chauffeur, I as a cleaner.

Each of the chauffeurs had two automobiles in his charge; it was his duty to have them always in good repair, and when any of the royal family desired to ride, the chauffeur went with the vehicle that was selected. The other men were of the mechanic type and regarded us with animosity, except young Schmidt, a splendid specimen of a man, and of a bearing which would have consorted rather with patrician stock than with the humble family from which he had sprung. We three roomed together in a quaint, old-fashioned apartment at the back of the stable, and all night long when our confidence had been established he raved of the princess. It would have become exceedingly monotonous, but for the fact that Nikolai and I saw in him a possible tool for the fulfillment of our design.

"You have not seen her?" he exclaimed, as he got into bed. "Ah, the universe was not completed until God made her. Such eyes—they would melt the candles upon our lady's altar. Such hair—radiant as the sun. And when she smiles—! And they would marry her to an insolent low-browed Polak, whom she despises."

"I hope the princess will select my automobile when next she goes riding," said Nikolai.

The young mechanic burst into a roar of laughter.

"Ho! ho! That's a good one!" he laughed. "Why don't you know that she never stirs from the castle unless an armed servitor accompanies her? Why, it is said that she is in love with a rascal of a guardsman, who would elope with her, and, though banished from Cassel-Wexel, is believed to be lurking in Hoch Cassel. No, my friend, you will never see the princess, into your automobile, for if you so much as turn your head when driving her you receive a month's wages and dismissal on the spot."

"Summers," said Nikolai to me on the following morning, as we sat together in the stable, "there is only one course for us to pursue. That young Schmidt is a regular sentimental German, and it is evident that, in his clownish way, he has fallen in love with the princess and would die to serve her. Now to unfold our scheme to him would mean immediate disclosure and our arrest. We must enlist his aid under the pretense that we are secret agents of the princess, who wishes to escape to her lover. Under that belief he will join us in our scheme—possibly the princess will herself willingly come with us—and we will drive into the country. Then stopping the machine, we will induce young Schmidt to descend under some pretext or other and will at once start her again and leave him behind us. Could anything be simpler?"

The plan did indeed seem feasible. On the following night, having received many confidences from Schmidt as to the princess's dislike for her Polish suitor, Nikolai very cautiously led up to his plan.

I was not prepared for what followed. Schmidt had been sitting upon his cot, half undressed, listening with open mouth. Of a sudden he sprang to his feet, and leaping across the room, sprang upon Nikolai and threw his arms around his neck and kissed him impetuously upon either cheek.

"God has sent you here," he cried. "I was the valet of the Herr Lieutenant von Offenbach, the princess' lover, and he obtained this post for me, through a mutual friend in the wild hope that I could bring the princess to him. And days have passed and, beyond the sending of a little note, I have been unable to do anything."

"Your note was received by the Princess, Schmidt," said Nikolai, "and she has communicated with her lover, who lies hidden in an old castle across the frontier. He sent us here; but now, how can we help?"

"The princess knows," cried Schmidt rapturously. "If we can gain access to her suite all will be easy. I will see her this afternoon and slip a note into her purse making an appointment, for I drive the state carriage in which she rides with the Polak to the cathedral for the ceremony of the betrothal."

On the next afternoon we saw Schmidt, seated motionless upon the box of the carriage, holding in the prince's bays; and, peering cautiously through a chink in the stable doors—closed by the chamberlain's orders—we saw a slight, girlish figure with a crown of fair hair, enter the carriage upon the arm of her father. Then the coachman whipped up the bays and the carriage disappeared in the direction of the capitol.

"All is arranged," said Schmidt that night. "I told her to drop her handkerchief in signal of acquiescence. Tomorrow night at eleven o'clock we climb—or I climb, rather—to the window of her room by means of the ivy which clings to the wall. She will be waiting for us. I affix a rope, carry her down—and all is done."

"And the automobile?" asked Nikolai.

"You can obtain a permit to stay until midnight in the stable under pretense of making repairs. At twelve the castle gates are closed and armed sentries parade the grounds. We must take the risk of passing them. Surely we can gain the entrance before they have time to shut the gates—and they will not dare to fire on the princess. Now you must have the automobile waiting, ready to start, and, the moment that we descend, we shall make a rush for it and away we go."

"The only undesirable feature of that program," said Nikolai, "is that the actual work will be performed by another. That clod of a German is our sole reliance."

"He will not betray us," said I. "The clown is an admirable tool—and simple as a child. Why, in America such a man with latent ingenuity and resources, would make his million; yet here he is content to remain a clown."

"God sends clowns to help the wise," said Nikolai.

Our conversation had been in English, and, though Schmidt knew that we had spent years in America, he was manifestly uneasy. Nikolai apologized for the use of the foreign tongue, and we spent the remainder of the evening discussing ways and means until our plans had been completely worked out.

On the following day I managed to put the prince's largest automobile out of commission by injuring the motor. Then I reported the matter to the chamberlain, who cursed me freely.

"Every day we need that machine for the guests who are arriving," he said.

When he had cooled down I suggested that Nikolai and I could repair the damage that evening if we could obtain a permit to remain in the stable. He cast a sharp glance at me, hemmed and hawed, and finally consented. This was the first success; at eight o'clock we two were left alone in the converted stable where the machines were housed.

"Mind you do good work," grumbled the chamberlain, coming on us suddenly and finding us seated in a corner discussing our project. "Curse you for a pair of Yankee idlers. You will mend that machine and make it as good as new or stay here all night until you have done so."

I laughed when he was gone. The injury was soon repaired, and we remained waiting for the appointed hour to arrive. Once Schmidt looked in cautiously and reassured us.

"It is all right," he said. "But there is one difficulty—happily not a serious one. His Highness the Polak is out on one of his furious night rides. God grant we do not run into his bays, for they gallop like the wind, and heaven knows how many miles they could run before we distanced them. At eleven one of you watch the princess's window. When you see the flicker of a match be ready."

At half-past ten, when the suspense was beginning to be unbearable, the chamberlain paid us a surprise visit.

"Well, fellows, have you mended the machine?" he asked.

"It is getting on," said Nikolai, guardedly, assiduously bending over a spare tire, which he was carefully deflating.

"It must be ready by morning," stormed the chamberlain, tearing his hair. "His highness, the prince, requires it to go to meet the parents of His Higness Prince Poniatowski. Ten thousand devils! it is the best and fastest of them all."

"Calm yourself," said Nikolai. "I mean, deign to be assuaged, Herr Chamberlain. We have located the injury. By twelve it will be mended."

We hoped he would go. But he stood there, having apparently taken a sudden and unexpected interest in the great racing automobile. We had to explain its mechanism to him; he examined the motor, the gasoline tank; he wanted the cubic contents of the inflated tires. Did he suspect something? We had almost given up hope when, at five minutes before eleven, he rose suddenly and stretched himself.

"The devil, but my old back aches," he said, in a mollified tone. "His highness would raise the devil with me if the machine were not in running order tomorrow." He strode to the door, and, as we followed him, I caught sight of a tiny spurt of flame at the princess's window.

The chamberlain perceived it, too. He looked in astonishment up through the clustering ivy; and then—I saw a form that clung from the window sill, and presently a tiny, slippered foot protrude.

Luckily I kept my self-possession. I ran back into the garage and began cranking furiously. I don't know what Nikolai did, but a moment later I heard a stifled scream, the sound of a fall upon wet turf; and then the chamberlain, his eyes protruding with horror, backed toward the garage. But all this while I was cranking and the automobile was commencing to snort like an impatient race horse. Next moment Schmidt and Nikolai came running into the garage, half leading, half carrying the princess. They placed her in the automobile and sprang in. I cranked once more; suddenly the thing began to start, and as I leaped in—there was no time to steer for anything but the center of the door—the machine caught the chamberlain in the middle of his broad back and hurled him a dozen feet away. I heard the thud of his body; and then he began screaming.

On the instant a blaze of electric lights appeared in the vacated apartment of the princess.

"Here! Get out of this!" yelled Schmidt; and, pushing me aside, he took the wheel. The machine was leaping over the Prince of Cassel-Wexel's rose bushes. We rushed across the broad lawns toward where an open space appeared in the high wall that surrounded the castle. "Close the gates!" I heard somebody yell; and the cry seemed to be taken up on every side. But they were too late. Just as the iron gates began to turn inward we were through with a bound and a leap, and hurling up dust on the highroad that led into Hoch Cassel. I heard the cries behind us die away; the lights in the castle windows, now all ablaze, drew together as we literally cut off the highroad abruptly and rushed the machine along a narrower path that led into the open fields. The night was dark, and here and there tiny lights flickered in farm-house windows. Nikolai caught Schmidt by the arm.

"That is all very well, Schmidt," he shouted, "but your way doesn't happen to be ours. You are going in the wrong direction."

I glanced at Schmidt. He sat impassively in the seat, one arm encircling the body of the princess, who seemed to have fallen into a swoon. Her eyes were closed and her lips slightly parted.

"To the devil with you!" cried Schmidt, throwing off my companion's arm. "Listen!" he added.

On the highroad behind us there came faintly to our ears the sound of galloping horses. And there were six or eight of them. I knew what threatened us. These were the bays of Prince Poniatowski, and he had been alarmed and was in full pursuit.

It seemed incredible that he could overtake us. Doubtless he had been nearing the castle when the alarm had been given, and was trying to intercept us by some shorter route, for the sounds now came from a road parallel with ours, some fifty yards away, which I could see gleaming like a broad, white ribbon as the moon emerged suddenly from under a cloud.

"We must shake him off," Schmidt cried. "Have you a pistol?"

Neither of us was armed. Incredible as the blunder appeared to be, we had left our revolvers in our "best" clothes.

"Hark," cried Schmidt again.

Above the whir of our automobile, above the noise of the wheels, we heard three sharp reports like pistol shots. Schmidt smiled grimly.

"The prince is urging his horses with his whip," he said, and drove the machine on at full speed. We leaped over obstructions, we swayed from side to side, coming within an ace of overturning now in one ditch, now in another. And all the while we heard the sound of the galloping bays.

"He takes the shorter road down the mountain," said Schmidt. "At the crossroads, one mile ahead, we meet."

We said nothing; there was nothing to say. We sat in silence behind the driver, whose arm still encircled the waist of the princess; and she seemed either to sleep or to be happy there. It was a strange denouement—that we, who had planned the plot, should thus play second fiddle to this clown.

The sound of the horses' hoofs grew louder. The crossroads appeared in front of us. And then, emerging from behind a cluster of trees, galloping furiously down the mountain side, we saw the coach of the prince, and a man upon the box who lashed his maddened horses. Suddenly Schmidt pressed the brake. There was a long grinding skid—and we came to a halt just as the driver pulled in his sweating team and rushed for our machine.

"Hold the princess," cried Schmidt, and rushed toward him. And then—

Well, I do not know how it happened, but suddenly, before we could collect ourselves for defense, the two of them were upon us, and in a trice we were pinned under them and helpless. I felt a pistol pressed against my forehead. I looked up into the laughing eyes of Schmidt. And the man with him was not the prince, as I had seen his photograph in the shop windows of Hoch Cassel, but a young fellow of about Schmidt's age and build and carriage.

"Gentlemen," said Schmidt calmly, "since you are at our mercy, yield and give us your pledge to obey our instructions. I should be loath to kill you."

"Who are you?" spluttered Nikolai.

"Herr Lieutenant von Offenbach, at your service," said Schmidt, bowing. "Gentlemen, my brother. Do you pledge yourselves?"

We did. We had to. We got into the automobile again and the five of us proceeded at a more leisurely pace, leaving the prince's coach standing in the road, the horses trembling and shivering in front of it.

"I will not ask you what your motives were, gentlemen, in seeking to steal my promised bride," said the lieutenant. "It may have been some chivalrous intent, or some more sinister reason. But inasmuch as you have played into my hands, I thank you.

"I own that at one time I had begun to despair, imagining you to be spies of the Polak, until I happened to overhear some of your very frank English conversations, which, needless to say, I understood perfectly. It was then that I contrived to have my brother, who was acting as the Polak's coachman, run away with his team and pretend to pursue us. The actual distance covered by the coach was less than a mile. The sounds came clearly at night from that mountain road—and your imagination did the rest. I do not think he could have caught us had not the route he was to take been carefully laid out by us in advance.

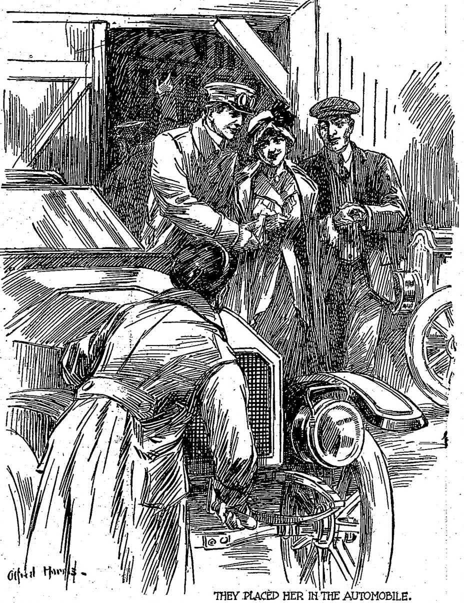
"I am now taking my bride across the frontier, where before the night is gone, we shall be united according to the rites of the Roman Catholic church, which, as you know, are indissoluble. I trust that I may have the pleasure of your company as witnesses."

"Well," whispered Nikolai, after a pause, "we thought that we were making use of our friend Schmidt, but it seems that he was making tools of us. Confound him," he added, suddenly enraged. "We played into his hands at every step. Why, we even cranked up his automobile for him."

"And ran over the chamberlain," I added, laughing at the recollection.

"And lost our ransom," continued Nikolai in a whisper.

"Well," I said, "we're here and we can't help it. And so let us say 'good-luck' to them."



THEY PLACED HER IN THE AUTOMOBILE.

WHY THE TERM HORSEPOWER

Originated With Watt, Who Produced the First Practical Steam Machinery.

When we say that an engine develops 100 horsepower we do not mean that one hundred horses could produce the same result. And, as the editor of Power remarks, there are few engineers who could tell just how the terms "horsepower" came into use. Its origin is related in the following quotation from "Farey on the Steam Engine," published in 1827:

"The machinery in the great breweries and distilleries in London was then moved by the strength of horses, and the proprietors of those establishments who were first to require Mr. Watt's engines always inquired what number of horses an intended engine would be equal to.

"In consequence, Mr. Watt made some experiments on the strong horses employed by the brewers in London, and found that a horse of that kind, walking at the rate of 2½ miles per hour, could draw 150 pounds avoirdupois by means of a rope passing over a pulley, so as to raise up that weight, with a vertical motion, at the rate of 220 feet per minute. This exertion of mechanical power is equal to 33,000 pounds (or 528. cubic feet) of water raised vertically through a space of 1 foot per minute, and he denominated it a horsepower, to serve for a measure of the power exerted by his steam engines."

This estimate is much beyond the capacity of the average strong horse, says Power. Smeaton and other early engineers estimated that 22,000 pounds per minute was more accurate.

German-American Institute.

Not many institutions for the promotion of international understanding can boast such a record of practical usefulness as the Amerika-Institut of Berlin, which this month completes its third year. Founded under the auspices of the Prussian ministry of education, and located in the new Royal library, its chief province has naturally been that of scholarship. But for the many Americans and Germans who, in public, scientific, and literary pursuits alike, find themselves in need of information as to what has been done across seas, it has become an invaluable medium of inquiry. Its services, again, to the great number of students, government officials, professors on sabbatical leave, and representatives of learned societies who are annually interchanged, ignorant often of local conditions and even language, cover a wide range. It has assisted the authors of 2,500 German books to obtain a copyright in America; it has encouraged the translation of books and articles in both countries; and it has accumulated a large library of Americana in Berlin, for the use of German scholars and exiles or visiting Americans. Such an institution seems peculiarly German in the very thoroughness with which it has substituted systematic methods for the naturally haphazard means of intercourse; but it is all the more to be wished that as between other European nations and the United States similar bureaus could be brought into existence.—New York Evening Post.

Joshing the Artist.

As a certain young artist of New York sat upon his stool one day in the Adriondacks, doing a bit of "mountain stuff," there approached him from the rear a native, evidently with ideas of his own touching art.

"Did you ever try photography?" asked his newcomer.

"No," was the curt response of the young artist, who continued his work.

"It's a good deal quicker," suggested the native.

"I suppose it is," surlily assented the painter, with another dab of the brush.

"And," the native added, with a dash of malice, "a good deal more like the place."

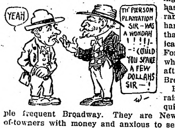
HAPPENINGS
in the
BIG CITIES

Some Inside Facts About the "Great White Way"

NEW YORK.—Broadway is one of the longest and most remarkable streets in the world. It starts at Bowling Green, amidst towering office buildings and meanders off into the wilderness somewhere near Yonkers. Besides being noted for its night life, Broadway has more skyscrapers, cafes, restaurants, actors, get-rich-quick-men, panhandlers and automobiles to the mile than any other thoroughfare in America. It also is the headquarters of the Forty-Second Street Country club, which meets every mild and sunny afternoon at Forty-second street and Broadway.



YEAH
TH' PIERSON PLANTATION SIR—WAS A WONDAH !!!!!— COULD YOU SPARE A FEW DOLLAHS SIR—!

Broadway's principal industry is raising coin. In this art it has become quite proficient. Two classes of people frequent Broadway. They are New Yorkers without money and out-of-towners with money and anxious to separate from it. The New Yorkers without money have developed the art of appearing to have it to such a fine point that it becomes a science. The art of removing superfluous coin from the persons of joy-seeking strangers along Broadway may also be numbered among the higher arts and sciences.

Although Broadway is haunted by bandits masquerading as head waiters, cloak room boys, southern colonels, wealthy mine owners "just in from the west," but who were never further west than Hoboken; stock brokers, etc., it is usually safe to venture upon the thoroughfare after dark if one keeps one's senses.

Not all the dangers of Broadway come from the presence of professional "Broadwaites." There is a ferocious person known as a "taxi chuff," with whose cash acquiring instincts it is best not to experiment.

If the "taxi chuff" had not a taste for mechanics he probably would have become a headwaiter or a cloak room "boy" instead of a mere driver of a taxicab, although it is very much open to question as to which pays the most.

At Bowling Green, Broadway is the very spirit of innocence. It runs past Wall street as if it were afraid of becoming contaminated. To add to its respectibility at this point Broadway nestles in its arms Trinity church, a religious institution which owns tenement houses on the side. Past office buildings that shoot high into the air, Broadway runs to St. Paul's, where there is another church and graveyard. "How fortunate," sigh the night-lifers, frequenters of another part of Broadway, "that all of the churches and dead ones are at the lower end."

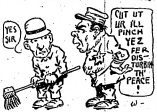
Ignoring the remarks of the gay Tenderloiners, Broadway dashes on uptown, past more office buildings, now not quite so tall, until Astor place is reached, just above which Grace church is met. From a thoroughfare of office buildings, Broadway has now changed into a street of plain commercial atmosphere. To tell the truth, however, Broadway has a commercial atmosphere for its entire length, although in the vicinity of Forty-second street it is skilfully disguised as "gayety."

When you begin to see the names of theatrical booking agents, when the cafes become more and more to the block, and the loiters on the corners greater and greater in number, you know you are then getting into the famous "White Light" district.

Being gay along Broadway is a business. Some New Yorkers know just how to be gay, and thereby infect others with the brand of gayety that induces them to spend their money.

When the Singing Hushed, the Crowd Hurried On.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—Coming down Meridian street one morning, shortly after 8 o'clock, just after crossing Ohio street, one heard a rich, sweet tenor voice. Pedestrians, hurrying to their work, listened to the sweet melody. Persons in the street looked up at the windows in the board of trade building and again over toward Christ church, as the melody seemed to come from that direction. However, no window was open and no one was to be seen. The strains grew louder and the words, "Ach che la Morte" from "Il Trovatore," rang out clear and distinct.



YES SIR
CUT UT UR I'LL PINCH YEZ FER DISTURBIN TH' PEACE !

Who is it! and where is it! was in everyone's mind and on every tongue. The sounds now came from the space between the board of trade building and Christ church, and the crowd moved in that direction. From the popular melody from "Il Trovatore" the singer took up the aria "Quando rapita in estasi," from "Lucia," and a florid and showy execution of that air followed.

By this time a policeman appeared and made inquiry as to the cause of the blockade. Apparently he was deaf to the music which every one enjoyed. His attention being called to the singing he walked to where a little hunchbacked street sweeper, stooping over his work, busily engaged in sweeping the alley, and utterly oblivious to the crowd, was giving vent to his enthusiasm by song.

"Shut up or I'll run yez in for disturbing the peace!" The singing was hushed, the spell was broken, and the crowd hurried on.

Cat Drives Off Burglars, and Puts Out a Fire

SPOKANE, WASH.—Sergt. Fred Pearson of the Spokane police department has a remarkable kangaroo cat, and the cat has a unique record of accomplishments for a feline. A year ago this cat began its career of notoriety by awakening Sergeant Pearson in time to drive three burglars away from his home. A few weeks later the cat put out a fire behind the kitchen stove by rolling in the flames, while Mrs. Pearson was in another room. Still another exploit was added to the cat's list of adventures when it woke Pearson up at midnight and led him to where a cow was doing damage to the garden. These are just a few of this animal's strange experiences.

Sergeant Pearson says his cat demonstrated its abnormal powers along a different line the other day, when it qualified as a milk inspector. Arising early the other morning, Sergeant Pearson discovered the cat sitting beside the milk crock left out all night for the milkman. Sergeant Pearson called the cat to give it its breakfast of meat, but the cat would not budge from its position beside the crock.

Soon the milkman arrived and poured out the supply for the Pearson home, the cat all the time watching him closely. The milkman returned the cover to the crock and left. For a number of minutes the cat watched the crock and then gradually crawled up to its side. With a paw the cat struck the cover from the top of the crock and made a dive with its head into the depths of the milk. Pearson ran up to interfere, and, to his surprise, saw the cat holding a small minnow in its mouth.

WANTS TO BE GOVERNOR OF OKLAHOMA

Seldom in recent years have the ups and down of life in this land of opportunty, the chances to make good and the impossibility of keeping a strong man down, been so patently exemplified as in the career of Al J. Jennings, former train robber and convict, who is seeking the Democratic nomination or the governorship of the state of Oklahoma. After several years' outlawry in the southwest, Jennings was captured and sentenced to five years in the federal prison at Columbus, O. President McKinley pardoned him and President Roosevelt restored his citizenship. He had taken his medicine without a whimper and on his release set out to lead a life that frankly acknowledged the early mistakes and sought to better himself and others throught what he had learned.

For some time he has been practicing law in Oklahoma and devoting himself to reform, attacking graft, bribery, political jobbery and trickery, and other delectable pursuits of the veteran spoilsmen. His straight-from-the-shoulder comments on the respectable crime of stealing from the public has resulted in practically a political earthquake in Oklahoma. He is like an errant gale of wind sending the silk hats sailing to the gutter. In explaining his decision to seek the nomination for governorship he says:

"I had been a train robber, a crude, open defier of society, and I had been caught and punished. I saw all about me men who wore the best clothes and stood high in society robbing the people right and left, and not getting caught or being punished. They were not as primitive as I had been in the method they chose. They did things in the dark, and only appeared in the open when they had on their Sunday clothes, so to speak. But, tell me, what is the difference between the man who holds up a train at the point of a gun and he who loots the treasury of a state?

"The only difference I can see is that the train robber is at least honest in acknowledging his character, while the spoilsman leads a double life."

WELL LIKED IN WASHINGTON

© HARRIS & EWING

Since her husband became a member of President Wilson's cabinet, Mrs. Josephus Daniels, wife of the secretary of the navy, has made herself one of the best loved women in Washington. Her personal popularity and that of her husband may be explained in the words of a white-haired woman who, last New Year day when the Secretary and Mrs. Daniels were holding a public reception, sat in their drawing room near the receiving line, holding a court of her own. Glancing proudly toward the host and hostess, the white-haired woman remarked:

"Those two love the whole world. No wonder people love them."

The speaker was Mrs. Daniels' mother, who knew whereof she spoke.

When Mrs. Daniels came from Raleigh, N. C., a few months ago to take her place in Washington's social life as one of the cabinet hostesses she brought with her four interesting young sons and their old colored mammy; also a few choice pieces of mahogany from her childhood home at Raleigh, her family servants and her receipt for beaten biscuit, an indispensable article of food on southern tables. Consequently the home of Secretary and Mrs. Daniels is typically southern in many respects.

CHAMPION OF FAIR SEX

"Women are responsible for the new philosophy of government—the philosophy which set human above material things," Gov. Hiram W. Johnson of California said in an address before the Woman's council at Sacramento.

Governor Johnson pointed out the many laws in which women of California led the fight—the eight-hour law, the immigration bill, the red light abatement bill, teachers and mothers' pensions and workmen's compensation. For all these Governor Johnson gave the women much credit.

"But do not think," he said, "that I have come here to compliment you alone. You have brought to politics a new era, but you have many of the faults under which men suffer.

"You like the limelight. You are almost as vain as men.

"Some of you are prejudiced and harsh.

"In short, you are exactly the same as your brethren except for one thing. They bring a fetich of tradition to politics—you think only of the concrete present."

ROGER SULLIVAN OUT FOR SENATOR

Roger C. Sullivan, former national Democratic committeeman from Illinois, whose elimination from party councils once was demanded by W. J. Bryan, has announced his candidacy for the nomination for United States senator. His announcement opens as follows:

"I am a candidate for the Democratic nomination for United States senator.

"No one has forced me into the contest; nor am I responding to 'insistent demands from all parts of the state.'

"It is true that a great many warm and loyal friends throughout Illinois have urged me to become a candidate and have offered me their earnest support; but I shall not make a false start by pretending to be a coy or reluctant candidate.

"The honor of representing Illinois in the United States senate is great enough for any man's ambition and the opportunity it offers for creditable public service is, in itself, sufficient reward."

A large part of Sullivan's ample fortune was made in the gas business in Chicago. His present views of public service companies' obligations to the Prisoner Sends Pictures to Mr. and Mrs. Wilson

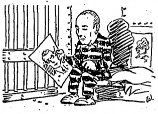
WASHINGTON.—When President Wilson reached Washington after his vacation on the gulf coast, he found awaiting him two pencil portraits, one of himself and the other of Mrs. Wilson. There was also a story, the like of which he had not met with every day since he entered the White House.



The pictures are the work of a convict in Sing Sing prison, and the story is that of his life. Both pictures and story are remarkable, so much so that several philanthropists in New York city, which was the scene in recent years of the crime of which the prisoner was convicted, saw to it that the pictures were sent to the White House, and have tried to implant a bit of hope in the man behind the bars.

Under one consideration only was the story of the pictures and contents of the letter which accompanied them revealed by the philanthropists, and that was absolute secrecy as to the prisoner's name and the details of his crime.

The convict's letter to the president was as follows:

"To the President of the United States.

"Your Excellency: It is not a desire to present a work of art which prompts me to send you this picture, for I realize there must be many crudities, owing to the fact that I never took a drawing lesson in my life; rather is it a token of highest regard and sincerest esteem which have been engendered within one of your humblest admirers.

"This picture and that of Mrs. Wilson are the only ones I have ever attempted; there were no mechanical aids—just the naked eye. All the work was done with an ordinary lead pencil, and to it were devoted the leisure moments of three months. It was executed in a cell whose dimensions are 3½ by 7 by 6 feet. The cell was illuminated by an 8-candlepower lamp, and the enlargement was made from a newspaper print, which accompanies the pictures.

"In view of these things it is hoped the crudities shall be overlooked, and each line and plane will testify to the respect and veneration in which the president is held by an obscure young man so low down in the social scale. Respectfully,

—————————."

One day, it is said, the convict saw another prisoner at work on a picture. Later a small bit of lead was doing considerable work each night in another cell. This time it was the photographs of the president and his wife that served as originals.

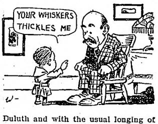
Then came a visit from the philanthropists. For a long time they had been interested in the young man. In fact, for five years they had sought to get inside the armor of moroseness that seemed to envelop him. At intervals they saw the pictures developing, gave their encouragement, and finally one day they were completed.

"A remarkable result of the work," said one of the philanthropists, "was its dispelling of the hopeless attitude of the prisoner. He grew infatuated with his work. His mind took on a new lease of life from having something to do. The shell of moroseness was cast off."

The pictures were sent to New York city, framed, and forwarded to the White House.

Nettleton Declares Mustache Will Have to Go

JOHN GILBERT NETTLETON, secretary to Congressman Martin B. Madden of Chicago, is having a hard time convincing his friends in the capital that he is the said Nettleton. The difficulty is all due to a small and a very black mustache. Here is the history of the hirsute adornment.



Mr. and Mrs. Nettleton had tired of conventional vacations. They wanted something out of the ordinary, and so they engaged passage on a lumber boat on the great lakes last summer.

The itinerary took the vessel to many places, with most of the time passed in open lake. Shaving seemed a loss of time and somewhat of a useless effort. Therefore the captain and Mr. Nettleton decided to let their whiskers grow. Eventually they made Duluth and with the usual longing of good sailors, couldn't resist going ashore. Whiskers, by that time luxuriant, were sacrificed, but the mustaches were left on. By the time Chicago was again reached Mr. Nettleton's facial attainment had become a matter of pride. He has nourished it tenderly ever since. But, alas! It will probably have to go after all.

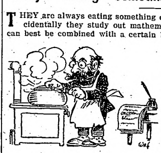
"It is either the loss of my mustache or of the kisses of one of my dearest friends," said Mr. Nettleton. "And I guess it will have to be the mustache. When three-year-old Paul Henderson, Jr., Mr. Madden's grandson, was making the round of the family the other night, kissing them good night, he overlooked me.

"When I reminded the young man, he acknowledged the oversight, but he pointed to my prized mustache, and declared in a lisping voice that it tickled. He compromised by kissing what my friends know to be a high forehead, noted for its scarcity of hair.

"I guess the mustache will have to go."

Always Eating Something at the Food Bureau

THEY are always eating something down at the bureau of food hygiene. Incidentally they study out mathematically the different ingredients which can best be combined with a certain brand of nutriment to make a pleasant dish, and the result of these experiments are duly set forth by Uncle Sam in his official cook-books. One time they started on tomatoes. They succeeded in doing things to tomatoes that the most imaginative tomato on earth never anticipated. They achieved stews that were wonders, and everybody duly performed the rite of gastronomy, fletcherizing the food and giving comfortable consideration to the progress of digestion.



It may not be supposed that this is mere idle experimenting. The result of the bureau are published broadcast by the newspapers and millions of people in the United States follow, without knowing it, the advice to these two scientists in matters of food. They are given chief credit for the recent popularity of mutton—not lamb, but good old English mutton.

It was Dr. Milner's idea that if more people would eat full-grown sheep instead of lambs the supply of meat in the United States would be perceptibly increased. Coming from old English stock himself and appreciating the value of proper recipes for cooking mutton, which has a peculiarly strong odor, he set out to carry the ideas into effect.

That he was wonderfully successful was subsequently attested by request he received for copies of the book which he put out through the department

KAISER SENDS GUNS INTO MEXICO CITY

BLUEJACKETS ACCOMPANY MACHINE GUNS AND 40,000 ROUNDS OF AMMUNITION.

NORTH MAY FORM A REPUBLIC

Secession Contemplated If Attack on Torreon is Longer Delayed—Plans of Rebels Given.

Vera Cruz, Feb. 24.—The commander of the German cruiser Dresden has shipped to the German legation in Mexico City two machine guns and forty thousand rounds of ammunition. Accompanying the shipment went a squad of blue jackets from the Dresden in civilian dress.

Picked American Guard.

The detail of blue jackets on duty at the American consulate here has been withdrawn and replaced by a guard of picked marines.

This step was taken after General Gustave Maas, commander of the federal forces here, had been notified and given his consent.

Plan Separate Republic.

Chihuahua.—Sentiment is growing among rebel leaders it was declared here that if the attack on Torreon is delayed much longer, or if the federal army succeeds in holding that city, northern Mexico will detach itself from the rest of the country and become a republic.

While General Carranza, the civil head of the revolution, and General Villa, the military head, disclaim any intention to be satisfied with anything less than the overthrow of Huerta and the success of the constitutionalist cause over the entire country, it is known that the plan to establish a northern republic has been seriously considered.

Scope of Republic.

The territory which it is said, might be formed into a separate republic embraces the five states along the United States border—Sonora, Chihuahua, Coahuila, Nuevo Leon and Tamaulipas, with possibly the inclusion of Sinaloa. From practically all this territory the Huerta army has been driven out, the chief remaining strongholds of the federals being at Tampico on the east, Monterey, Saltillo and Torreon on the south; Guaymas on the west and Nuevo Laredo and Piedras Negras on the north.

As suggesting that the revolutionary leaders may have to content themselves with their victories in the north, officials high in the rebel government point out that one reason for the overthrow of President Madero was that he represented the ideals of the north at the seat of government in the south where progress has not kept pace with the northern states.

That by delaying his attack on Torreon, General Villa has lost some of the prestige which he gained in the quick victory at Ojinaga is conceded here.

SINGLE TAX EXPONENT DIES

Joseph Fels, Millionaire Soap Man, Gave Fortune to Cause He Espoused.

Philadelphia, Feb. 24.—Joseph Fels, millionaire soap manufacturer, single tax advocate and philanthropist, died at his home here from pneumonia after a brief illness. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Fels spent most of his time advocating the doctrine of the single tax in both this country and Great Britain. He recently returned from England, where he had given a large part of his fortune to the creation and the maintenance of a single tax co-operative colony near London.

Employes of his firm in this city benefit by a profit sharing system inaugurated by Mr. Fels.

Although he early became an advocate of Henry George's ideas, it was not until he went to live in England, about eight years ago, as the English representative of his firm, that Mr. Fels began to devote almost all his time, money and energy to the cause of single tax.

Since then, his friends estimate, he expended more than $100,000 annually and visited every part of the world to advance the propaganda.

His guarantee to the Fels fund in America, with headquarters in Cincinnati, was $25,000 a year.

Fourteen Lifesavers Perish.

Queenstown, Feb. 23.—Fourteen lifesavers perished in the surf attempting to rescue the crew of the Norwegian schooner Mexico, which went ashore off the Weford coast in a terrific gale. All of the crew of the schooner were saved. The vessel broke up and was completely destroyed.

London Suffragette Leader Escapes.

London, Feb. 23.—The Women's Political and Social Union claims that Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, the militant suffragette leader, aided by a body guard of her own supporters, escaped Sunday night from the house in Camden Hill Square after a scuffle with the police. It was from a window of this house that Mrs. Pankhurst made a speech nearly two weeks ago, attacking the government for its attitude toward woman suffrage, and the police since then have been trying to find and re-arrest her.

TRAIN ROBBERS GET $40,000

QUEEN AND CRESCENT PASSENGER TRAIN HELD UP.

Three Masked Men Ransack Mail Car, But Overlook Sack Containing $10,000—Clerk is Stabbed.

Birmingham, Ala., Feb. 21.—Queen and Crescent passenger train No. 1, New York to New Orleans, running 40 minutes late, was held up about 12 miles north of here by three masked robbers, who obtained four sacks of registered mail, said to have contained more than $40,000.

At Attala three men boarded the engine and one and one-half miles south of Attala held up the engine crew at the point of revolvers. They then ran the train to within five miles of Irondale, where they forced the crew to uncouple the mail and express cars.

The robbers then entered the mail car and covered the five clerks. They asked for the chief clerk and demanded the registered mail. The clerk replied he had none, resisted and was stabbed. The robbers ransacked the car and obtained the registered mail pouches. They then took the New York-New Orleans registered mail and fled, leaving one sack containing $10,000 behind. The express car was not molested.

Birmingham officials of the Queen and Crescent were notified of the holdup and a special train rushed officers and bloodhounds to the scene. No trace of the robbers was found. The officers are in pursuit.

BOHEMIANS ARREST AMERICAN

Chicago Man Would Not Stand When the National Air Was Played.

Vienna, Feb. 23.—Through the intervention of Frank Deedmeyer, the American consul at Prague, who was vigorously supported by Frederic Courtland Penfield, the American ambassador here, a sentence of 14 days' imprisonment against S. Kruty, a native of Bohemia, but an American citizen residing in Chicago, was reduced to three days' imprisonment and an order for Kruty's deportation was revoked.

The authorities alleged that Kruty refused to stand during the playing of the national anthem at a public ball in the town of Pisek, although he had been admonished by the police captain that he must do so.

Kruty recently came from Chicago to Bohemia to take violin lessons.

Two More Englishmen Missing in Juarez—Gustavo Bauch Also Disappears.

El Paso, Texas, Feb. 23.—Two more Englishmen are reported as having "disappeared" in Juarez. The report came from Samuel Stewart who says the men, John Lawrence and a companion named Curtis, went to Juarez Wednesday to search for William S. Benton. Thompson expressed the fear that they like Benton, had been shot. Thompson, with Major Holmdahl of Villas staff, was permitted to search the jails and guard houses of Juarez, but found no trace of them. Lawrence is chief engineer of the California Development company and came here on a vacation from Yuma, according to Thompson.

Japanese Submarine Missing.

Hiroshima, Japan, Feb. 23.—A Japanese submarine attached to the protected cruiser Hirado has been missing for three days. The naval authorities believe it has met with disaster and that all on board have been drowned.

Dane Dog Gets Medal.

New York, Feb. 21.—"Jim," the great Dane dog belonging to H. T. Galpin, has been presented with a bronze medal by the New York Women's league for animals for saving the life of his master. On the morning of October 21, last, Jim dragged his master from his burning apartment. Gas escaping from a melted fixture had overcome Mr. Galpin but he soon revived in the open air, where the dog had dragged him and awakened others in the apartment.

G. N. TRAIN HELD UP; THREE MEN KILLED

VERY DARING ROBBERY OCCURS NEAR BELLINGHAM, WASHINGTON.

RESISTING PASSENGERS SHOT

Fusillade of Bullets Follows Attempt To Overpower Armed Desperado—Two Masked Men Firing—Bandits Escape.

Bellingham, Wash., Feb. 23.—Three passengers on a Great Northern train, No. 358, bound for Vancouver, B. C., were shot to death by holdup men whom they had tried to resist. The holdup occurred when the train was running along the edege of the bay, nine miles south of Bellingham.

Three Men Killed.

The men killed were: Thomas B. Wadsworth, a Canadian Pacific conductor of Vancouver; R. L. Lee of Bremerton, Wash., and H. R. Adterson, a traveling salesman of Vancouver.

There were three bandits and two of them did the shooting. One had an automatic revolver and poured bullets among the men, who grappled with him, while women screamed and fainted.

The men are believed to have boarded the train at Burlington, a few miles south of the place of the holdup. They sat quietly in the smoking car for a few miles, then were seen to leave the car and go into the vestibule. They emerged from the vestibule and walked into the day coach, the next car. They then had white handkerchiefs tied over their faces.

Method of Bandits.

One of the men entered the coach and walked through to the rear door. Another man stood just inside the front door. The third man stayed in the vestibule. The man who walked through the car started to lock the rear door.

As he stopped the three passengers who were killed leaped from their seats simultaneously and grappled with him. The desperado at the forward end of the coach began shooting into the car. There was an immediate panic. The car lights were lit and the gun man aimed his revolver at the globes, with a few shots extinguishing nearly every one.

The robber at the rear end of the coach had shaken sufficiently loose from the men who sought to hold him to get his revolver in action. It was an automatic and rang death as soon as he opened fire. At the first shot Lee fell, badly wounded. He tried to crawl away under a seat. Two more shots killed Wadsworth and Adterson. Then the robber saw Lee trying to get under a seat. He turned the gun on the wounded man and pumped six deadly shots into his back. Lee died instantly. None of the shots fired by the other desperado hit any one.

No Resistance Now.

Other men passengers were not molested and no attempt was made to injure the hysterical women. The car was a pall of smoke when the murderer of three started back to the front of the coach to rejoin his partners. No one tried to molest or stay him this time.

Women thrust their purses at him as he walked down the aisle. He carried his smoking revolver, blue steel barrel turned toward the cowed passengers, in one hand and with the other he snatched the purses offered him, stowing them away in his pockets. After he had seized several he ran the rest of the way toward the car door.

Mexican Vessel in Danger.

Queenstown, Feb. 23.—A vessel believed to be the Norwegian bark Mexico, bound from Laguna, Mex., for Falmouth was driven ashore on the rocks of the Saltee islands off the coast of Wexford during a gale. Two lifeboats, one from Fethard and one from Kilmore, went to the rescue. One of the lifeboats reached the vessel but was stove in. The crew, however, managed to scramble aboard the bark, although several of the men were severely injured. The other lifeboat was driven out to sea and is missing.

THAW CASE IS AGAIN ARGUED

IS LIKELY TO BE TAKEN TO HIGH COURT.

New Hampshire Judge Intimates as Much—Thaw May Receive Income From Estate.

Concord, N. H., Feb. 23.—Reasons for granting the petition of Harry Kendall Thaw for a writ of habeas corpus to prevent his extradition to New York as a fugitive from justice, were presented to Edgar Aldrich, federal judge. Arguments against the petition were given by William T. Jerome, representing New York.

Regarding the other question involved in the hearing—that of admitting Thaw to bail—Judge Aldrich, without making a formal ruling, intimated that he might leave it to the federal supreme court for decision.

The bail petition was not mentioned until Thaw's counsel expressed a desire for an immediate ruling on it. They argued that since a commission appointed by the court had found that Thaw was not a menace to the community, no reason existed for refusing him admission to bail.

Judge Aldrich said that if the question of bail had been brought to his attention earlier he might have viewed it in a different light. With the likelihood in mind that the whole case would soon be removed from his jurisdiction to that of the United States supreme court, he felt that it might be best to leave the question of bail to the justices of that court for decision.

To this, William M. Chase, of counsel for Thaw, replied that as Judge Aldrich knew thoroughly all branches of the case he ought to pass upon that feature of it rather than refer it to the higher courts, before which there would need to be a repetition of much of the evidence.

Thaw May Get $150,780.17.

Pittsburg.—Unless proceedings to show that he is a lunatic are instituted in the courts of Allegheny county within 60 days, Harry K. Thaw will receive $150,780.17 income from the estate held in trust for him by the Fidelity Title and Trust company of Pittsburg.

A decision to this effect was handed down by a majority of the judges of the Orphans' court of Allegheny county. Judges J. W. Over and T. B. Trimble concurred in the decision, while Judge J. J. Miller dissented from portions of it.

In the decision it is declared that if Thaw, as he alleges, is a citizen of this county and state and as this county was his last place of residence in this state, the jurisdiction of lunacy proceedings is in the common pleas courts of this county. The majority report agress that notwithstanding the fact Thaw was acquitted of murder on the grounds of insanity and was lodged in an insane asylum in New York state, he has never been declared insane in this county or state and no proceedings to declare him sane can be taken here.

Inmates Temporarily Homeless Cared for by Neighbors—All Escaped Without Injury.

Port Huron, Mich., Feb. 23.—Seventy-three inmates of the St. Clair county Poor House at Goodells were rendered temporarily homeless by a fire which almost completely destroyed the structure. Some of the inmates, old and feeble, had to be carried from the building, but none of them was injured. They were given shelter in Maccabee hall and nearby homes.

Mrs. Bond antWs Retrial.

Oklahoma City, Okla., Feb. 23.—Motion for a retrial of the $50,000 damage suit instituted by Mrs. Minnie E. Bond of Oklahoma City against United States Senator T. P. Gore, in which a verdict for the defendant was returned here has been filed in behalf of Mrs. Bond. Date for a hearing has not been set. In her suit Mrs. Bond charged that the senator attacked her in a Washington hotel last March. Alleged misconduct of the jury and misdirection of the court are among the grounds set up.

GEN. VILLA TRIES TO JUSTIFY EXECUTION

CHARGE BENTON DREW REVOLVER THREATENING REBEL LEADER.

U. S. LAWS OF WAR CITED

Claim Is Made Constitutionalists Acted Plainly Within Army Rules—England to Await American Investigation.

Washington, Feb. 23.—White House officials say that official reports from General Villa and his friends declared William S. Benton, the British ranchman, was executed because he entered the camp of Villa armed and threatened the life of the constitutionalist commander.

To Await Investigation.

In view of this latest report, there was a disposition at the White House to await a full investigation of the facts before expressing any opinion. It was also stated that Great Britain was holding in obeyance any representation, pending the completion of a report on the affair by the American government.

Late official dispatches to the state department containing Villa's version of the affair were brought to the White House, but a complete account of the killing as personally explained to Consul Edwards is on its way by mail.

Story of Villa.

Official dispatches from American consular representatives say further that Villa alleges Benton came to him armed, and that during the course of a long argument and quarrel Benton raised a gun to shoot, but was disarmed, and a trial by a military court followed. Villa takes the position that a foreigner who threatened the life of a military officer is subject to no immunity or the rights ordinarily extended to non-combatants.

Announcement that Benton met death in Juarez after a courtmartial ordered by Villa was made by Secretary Bryan, who said he had no further details. His information came in a dispatch from Consul Edwards at Juarez, who said he had read the courtmartial proceedings which were forwarded by mail to Washington.

Secretary Bryan communicated Consul Edwards' latest message to Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, the British ambassador, and instructed Consul Edwards to demand adequate protection and a fair hearing for Gustav Bauch, an American citizen, for whose safety in Juarez grave apprehension has been felt. Friends of Bauch in El Paso have telegraphed to Representative Smith of Texas that he had been shot as a spy. No report had been received at the state department today on the reported disappearance of two other Englishmen.

Villa Justifies Action.

Villa today telegraphed Robert V. Pesquiera, constitutionalist agent here, as follows:

"The attention of the commanding general of the division of the north having been drawn to the published reports in respect to the recent execution of William S. Benton, he desires known that the action of the authorities in that case was entirely justified by the laws and usages of war.

"Under article 84 of general order 100, for the government of the United States, in the field, it is provided that 'armed prowlers' who come within the line of the army of occupation with hostile intent, are not entitled to the privileges of prisoners of war.

"Article 85 provides that persons within occupied territory who employ violence toward the established authorities are subject to the penalty of death whether they arise singly or in number.

Attempted Act of Violence.

"There is absolutely no doubt but what Benton, a Huerta sympathizer, and a murderer of Mexican citizens, deliverately attempted an act of violence against the person and life of the commanding general, and for that reason, in accordance with the laws and usage of war, he was tried by a military tribunal, constituted for that purpose, and executed pursuant to its sentence, a proceeding sustained by American and European precedents."

England to Wait.

London.—The British government, for the present at least, will leave the investigation of the execution of William S. Benton, a British ranch owner in Mexico, wholly in the hands of the United States. The foreign office issued this statement:

"At the request of his majesty's ambassador at Washington, the United States government, which has promised protection to British subjects in such parts of Mexico where no British consulates exist, has instructed United States consular representatives thoroughly to investigate the circumstances of William S. Benton's death."

Mrs. Pankhurst In Hiding.

London, Feb. 23.—The whereabouts of Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, the militant suffragette leader, is a mystery to the police. Not since she addressed a crowd from the window of her temporary residence in Campden Hill square more than a week ago, has she been located by the authorities, who are trying to arrest her.

Mrs. Pankhurst had a long letter in the newspapers, however, in which she accuses Reginald McKenna, the home secretary, of discrimination in the treatment of suffragette prisoners.

PROBABLY TOLD THE TRUTH

Scotsman's Boast Seemed Far-Fetched but Explanation Put a Different Face on It.

John Butler Yeats, who paints portraits and, incidentally, is the father of William Butler Yeats, the Irish poet, is a regular patron of a certain New York restaurant. Among the habitues of this place he has acquired a reputation as a raconteur. "In my part of Ireland," he tells, "there was a noisy Scotsman whose abuse of everything Irish riled the neighbors considerably. At first, however, he refrained from bragging about Scotland, and we decided to wait until he should be guilty of that indiscretion before acting drastically. The chance came at last. He had been swearing at the Irish peat fires, the Irish rain, and the Irish spuds, and ended up by saying that, 'Hoot mon, Scotland was verra deeferent! It was a land flowing with milk and honey.' Well, we went for him, Scotland, we pointed out, was known to be a barren waste inhabited by starvelings, and the Biblical quotation he had used could not have been more outrageously misapplied. He looked us over with his canny eye. 'Ye're wrang,' he said, 'and I can prove it. Scotland flowed wi' milk, and maybe honey, a' the time that I wis there. I left when I wis ten months auld.'"

Quite Natural.

A traveler was riding on muleback through a very wild and turbulent region where human life was among the cheapest of commodities. Noticing a cross surmounting a heap of stones by the roadside, he asked his guide what it meant.

"That is a grave," said the guide. "It means that the man died on that spot and was buried there."

"Indeed," remarked the traveler, "and how did he die?"

"He died a natural death, sir."

"What do you mean?"

"He was shot."

Great Expectations.

In a certain family the wife never could see things when they were under her very nose, while the husband had a positive genius for finding not only his own put other people's things. SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The general offers Francois a home at the Chateau. The boy refuses to leave his parents, but in the end becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis' son while the former goes to America. The Marquis before leaving for America asked Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her lackeys. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill, in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis's brother Francois lures the Austrians from the hotel allowing the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants, and through him sends word to his friends of his plight. The general, Alixe and Pietro hear from Francois and plan his rescue. Francois as a guest of the Austrian governor of the castle prison inspects the interior of the wine cellar of the Zappis. Francois receives a note from Pietro explaining in detail how to escape from his prison. Alixe awaits him on horseback and leads him to his friends on board the American sailing vessel, the "Lovely Lucy." Francois, as a guest of Harry Hampton, on the "Lovely Lucy," goes to America to manage Pietro's estate in Virginia. Francois wins the respect and admiration of the aristocratic southerners.

CHAPTER XXI.

Hero Worship.

It had come about that Lucy Hampton was a scholar of Francois. The colonel, lamenting on a day that there were no capable teachers of French in the neighborhood, that Lucy's schoolgirl command of the language was fast disappearing, and an accomplishment so vital to a lady was likely soon to be lost—this saga of regret being sung by the colonel at the dinner-table, Francois had offered to teach mademoiselle his mother tongue. And the colonel had accepted the offer.

"If you are not too busy, Chevalier. And I suppose your—ah—accent—is entirely good? One can not be too careful, you know. At least we shall not quarrel about the terms, for whatever money you think right to ask I shall be ready to pay," and the colonel felt himself a man of the world and extremely generous.

"Father!" Lucy cried quickly.

Francois' eyes were on his plate but they swept up with their wide brown gaze full on the colonel's face. "I am not too busy, Monsieur the Colonel. As for my accent—I am a peasant, as Monsieur knows, but yet I am instructed. I was for years at Saint-Cyr, the great military school of France. I believe my accent is right. As for money"—a quick motion, all French, spoke a whole sentence. "If Monsieur insists on that—that must finish it. To me it would be impossible to take money for the pleasure of teaching mademoiselle." He flashed at Lucy a smile all gentleness, and Lucy's eyes, waiting for that smile, met his shyly.

The colonel blustered a bit, but the lessons were arranged as Francois wished, twice a week throughout the winter he rode over from Carnifax to give them. And little by little he came to know the small mistress of the manor as few had known her. People thought Lucy Hampton too serious and staid for a young girl; no one realized that, her mother being dead and her father such as he was, the clear-headed little person had begun at ten or twelve years old to know that she must make her own decisions, and many of her father's also. At fourteen she had taken the keys and the responsibilities of the house, and now, at sixteen, she was in reality the head of the whole great plantation. The colonel, who would have been most indignant to be told so, leaned on her in every detail, and it was she who planned and decided and often executed the government of the little kingdom.

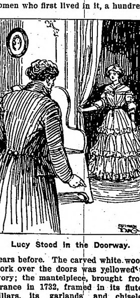
All this lay on the slender shoulders of Lucy Hampton, and besides all this she had begun in very childhood to hold up the hands and do the thinking of an incompetent father. It was not wonderful that she was graver and slower to frolic than other girls of sixteen. Her conscientious young brain was full of care, and light-heartedness of youth had never had a chance to grow in that crowded place. Her cousin had come to live with them only the year before, when his mother had died, his father being dead long ago; and Lucy knew quite well that her father had planned that the two should marry and unite the broad acres of the Hamptons.

But the young longing for romance which was in her in spite of the choking sober business of her life, rebelled at this. She would not give herself as well as all her thought and effort for Roanoke. She wanted to love somebody, and be loved for herself as other girls were; she would not marry Harry because he and her father considered it a good arrangement. So strongly had this determination seized her that, looking entirely down that way of thought, she failed to see that Harry might not be classed with the colonel in his view of the plan. She failed to see that if she had not been heiress to Roanoke House, or to anything at all, Harry Hampton would still have been in love with his cousin Lucy. For Harry saw how the young life had been pressed into a service too hard for it almost from babyhood; Harry saw how unselfish she was and trustworthy; how broad-minded and warm-hearted; how she would like to be care free and irresponsible like other girls of her age, only that the colonel and the estate were always there, always demanding her time and her attention. He could do little to help her as yet, but he longed to lift the weight and carry it with her, not away from her, for the fairy of a person was not the sort to lean on others or to be happy without her share of the burden. Yet, Harry thought, "If I might only help her, and make it all a delight instead of a labor!"

But Lucy, going about her busy days, never guessed this. She thought of Harry as the boy whom she had grown up with, to be cared for tenderly always because of his misfortune, to be helped and planned for and loved indeed, because he was lame and her cousin, and because he was a dear boy and her best friend. But as the hero of her own romance to come, she refused to think of him at all. More firmly she refused such an idea, of course, because her father had hinted that it would complete both Harry's and his happiness.

Francois, with quick insight, saw as much as this, and was anxious for the boy who had been his warm and steady friend. What he did not see was that Luck was fitting his own personality into that empty notch of her imagination where an altar stood and a candle burned, ready for the image that was to come above them. That never entered his mind, for in his mind Alixe was the only woman living to be considered in such a relation. And, in spite of the seigneur, in spite of Pietro, in spite of his whole-hearted giving up of her, there was a happy obstinate corner in the depths of his soul which yet whispered against all reason that it might be that Alixe loved him, that it might be, for unheard-of things happened every day, it might be, yet that—with all honor, with all happiness to those others whom he loved—he might some day be free to love her. So that as he grew to care for and understand Lucy Hampton more and more, no faintest dream of caring for her as he did for Alixe came ever into his mind.

On an evening when winter was wearing away to cold spring, Francois waited in the dining-room of Roanoke House for his scholar. The room had a sweet and stately beauty, a graceful stiffness like the manners of the women who first lived in it, a hundred years before. The carved white woodwork over the doors was yellowed to ivory; the mantelpiece, brought from France in 1732, framed in its fluted pillars, its garlands and chiseled nymphs and shepherds, as if under protest, the rollicking orange of the fire. Over a mahogany sofa, covered with slippery horsehair, hung a portrait of the first lady of the manor and Francois, sitting soldierly erect in a straight chair, smiled as his gaze fell on it—it was so like yet so unlike a face which he knew. There was the delicate oval chin and straight nose, and fair, loose hair. But the portrait was staid and serious, while Lucy's face, as this man had seen it, had kindly eyes and a mouth smiling always. He shook his head in gentle amusement at the grave dignity of the picture.



Lucy Stood in the Doorway.

"But no, Madame—you are not so charming as your granddaughter," he said, addressing it aloud.

And then he stepped across the room to the fire, and held his hands to it and stared into it. The clock ticked firmly, the logs fell apart with soft sliding sounds, and he stared down at them—his thoughts far away—a look came into his eyes as if they concentrated on something beyond the range of sight, the characteristic look of Francois, the old look of a dreamer, of a seer of visions.

Then Lucy stood in the doorway, gentle, charming from the slippered feet, locked over the instep to the shadowy locks of light hair on her forehead.

"Good evening, Monsieur. I am sorry I kept you waiting. Hannibal hurt his foot and I must find plaster and bandage for him. But you will have enough of my talking even now. Father says I talk a great deal. Do I, Monsieur?"

Francois stood regarding her, with frank admiration in every muscle of his face. He smiled, the same gentle amused smile with which he had addressed the portrait. "You never talk too much for me, Mademoiselle. It is a pleasure to me always to hear your voice," he answered in the deep tone of a Frenchman, the tone that has ever a half note of tragedy, as of some race-memory which centuries do not wipe out. "Only," he went on speaking in French, "one must not talk English. That is breaking the law, you remember, Mademoiselle."

She answered very prettily in his own tongue, in words that halted a little. "Very well, Monsieur. I will do my best." He still gazed at her smiling, without speaking. One could understand that, to a girl of more self-contained people, this open homage of manner, this affectionate gentleness, might seem to mean more than a brotherly loyalty. The girl's pulse was beating fast as she made an effort for conversation. "What were you thinking of as you looked at the fire when I came in, Monsieur? It had an air of being something pleasant. Did I not say all that beautifully?" she finished in English.

He corrected a lame verb with serious accuracy and she repeated the word, and laughed happily.

"But you haven't said yet what you were thinking about."

The large brown eyes turned on hers. "It was of my old home in France, Mademoiselle, when I was very little," he said simply. "A large fire of logs makes me think of that."

"Tell me about it," she begged with quick interest. "Will you? Was there always a fire at your house?"

"But no, Mademoiselle—not, of course, in the summer. It was of the winter time I thought, when the neighbors came, in the evening, and we sat about the hearth, sometimes twenty people, each at his different duty, and my brothers and sisters were there, and the dear grandmere, was there and—" he stopped. "Does Mademoiselle really wish to hear how it was in that old farm-house of ours, in the shadow of the Jura Mountains?"

"Indeed, Mademoiselle wishes it," she assured him. "It will be a trip to Europe. I am sure I shall speak better French for going to France for ten minutes, and being among the French people, your friends. Wait now, till I am comfortable." She turned a deep chair so that it faced him, and dropped into it. "Put a footstool for me," she ordered, as southern women order the men they care for—and the men they do not. And she settled back with her little feet on it and smiled at him. For a moment the man's brilliant gaze rested on her and the girl saw it, and thrilled to it. "Now, Monsieur, racontez-moi une histoire," she spoke softly.

Francois Beaupre's look turned from her to the fire, and the air of gazing at something far away came again. "It is a picture I see as I think of that time of my childhood," he began, as if speaking to himself. "A picture many times painted in homelike colors on my brain. Many a night in the winter I have sat, a little boy, by the side of my grandmother, at that great hearth, and have looked and have seen all the faces, have heard all the voices and the fire crackling, and the spinning-wheel whirring, even as I see them and hear them tonight.

"And from time to time one of the men, as he talked, rose up and strode across the room to the great oak table where lay always on a wooden plate a long loaf of black bread, with a knife, and always a glass and a bottle of eau-de-vie—brandy. And I remember how manly it looked to me, watching, when I saw him take the loaf under his arm and hold it, and slice off boldly a great piece of the fresh rye bread, and pour out a glass of brandy and toss it off as he ate the bread. The stories seemed to grow better after the teller had done that.

"And always I waited, even through the tale of the ghost and the fire-breathing hound, till the talk should swing round, as it did ever toward the end, to the stories of Napoleon that were fresh in men's minds in those days. It was as if I sat on needles before my bedtime came, yet I did not dare to be restless and move about for fear that my mother might send me suddenly to bed. But I always gave a sigh of content and always the grand-mere patted my head softly to hear it, when my father cleared his throat and began—"

"'There is a small thing that happened when the Emperor was marching'—and then he was launched on his tale."

A great hickory log fell, rolled out toward the hearth. The carved nymphs and shepherds seemed to frown in disapproval at this irregularity, and the girl in the deep chair smiled, but the man sprang up and put the log back in place with quick efficiency. He stood silent by the tall mantelpiece, deep yet in his reverie, as the flames caught the wood again and sparkled and spluttered.

"Did any of them ever see Napoleon—those men who talked about him?" the girl asked.

The Frenchman turned a queer look on her, and did not answer.

"Did any of your family ever see him, Monsieur?" she asked again.

The alert figure stepped backward, sat down again on the gilded chair and leaned forward consideringly. Francois nodded as if to the fire. "But yes, Mademoiselle," he said, in a whisper.

"Oh, tell me!" the girl cried, all interest. "Who was it? How was it? It couldn't be"—she hesitated—"yourself! If you, whom I know so well, should have seen the Emperor!" She caught a deep breath of excitement. This was another Lucy Hampton from the serious young mistress of Roanoke House whom the country people knew. "Quickly, Monsieur, tell me if it was yourself!"

Francois turned his eyes on her. "Yes, Madamoiselle," he answered.

"You have seen Napoleon!" she said, and then, impetuously, "Tell me about it!" But, though he smiled at her with that affectionate amusement which she seemed, of all sentiments, oftenest to inspire in him, he did not answer.

"Monsieur! you will not refuse to tell me when I want to know so much!" she pleaded, and went on. "How old were you? Did he speak to you? What did he say to you?"

And the Frenchman laughed as if at a dear child who was absurd. "Mademoiselle asks many questions—which shall I answer?" he demanded, and the tone to her ear was the tone of love, and she trembled to hear it.

"Answer"—she began, and stammered and flushed, and stopped.

Francois went on, little thinking what damage he was doing with that unconscious charm of voice and look.

"It is as Mademoiselle wishes, most certainly. I will even answer Mademoiselle's two questions at once to please her. It was when I was not quite three years old, Mademoiselle, at home in the farm-house in the valley of the Jura."

"And he spoke to you, to your own self? Are you sure?"

"But yes, he spoke to me, Mademoiselle."

"What did he say?" The smile on Francois' face went out and into its place swept an intensity of feeling; he answered solemnly: "There were but few words, Mademoiselle, but they have been much to my life. They shall lead my life, if God pleases, those words shall lead it to the fate which they foretold."

"What were the words?" whispered the girl, impressed with awe.

Francois suddenly stood erect and stretched out his arm as if to hold a sword. "'Rise Chevalier Francois Beaupre, one day a Marshal of France under another Napoleon,'" he repeated dramatically. "Those were the words the Emperor said."

CHAPTER XXII.

The Story Again.

The girl, her face lifted to him, looked bewildered. "I don't understand."

The visionary eyes stared at her uncertainly. "I have never told this thing," he said in a low tone.

"Ah—but it's only me," begged the girl.

"Only you, Mademoiselle!" His voice went on as if reflecting aloud. "It is the guiding star of my life—that story; yet I may tell it"—he paused—"to 'only you.'"

Again the girl quivered, feeling the intensity, mistaking its meaning. "I should be glad if you would tell it," she spoke almost in a whisper, but Francois, floating backward on a strong tide to those old beloved days, did not notice.

"It may seem a simple affair to you, Mademoiselle—I can not tell that. It has affected my life. The way of it was this: Napoleon marched to Germany in the year 1813, and passed with his staff through our village. The house of my father was the largest in the village, and it was chosen to be, for an hour, the Emperor's headquarters, and the Emperor held a council of war, he and his generals, there. I, a child of three, was sleeping in a room which opened from the great room, and I wakened with the sound of voices, and ran in, unnoticed, for they were all bent over the table, looking at the maps and lists of the mayor—and I pulled at the sword of Marshal Ney. And the marshal, turning quickly, knocked me over. I cried out, and my grandmother ran to me, and I have often heard her tell how she peeped from the door under the shoulder of the big sentry who would not let her pass, and how she saw a young general pick me up and set me on my feet, and how all the great officers laughed when he said that the sword was in contest between Marshal Ney and me. And how, then, the young general suggested that, to settle the point amicably, the marshal should draw his sword and give me the accolade—the blow of knighting. And so, Mademoiselle, to shorten the tale, it was not the marshal, but the Emperor himself who chose to do it. He made me kneel before him, I—a baby—and he struck my shoulder the blow of the accolade, and said the words which I have told you."

Francois sprang to his feet and stood as he repeated once more the Emperor's words. His voice shook.

"'Rise Chevalier Francois Beaupre, one day a Marshal of France under another Bonaparte,'" he cried, thrilled through with the words which he repeated.

The girl leaning forward, watched him; with a gasp she spoke. "Then—that is why you are really Chevalier Beaupre? Did the Emperor have the right to—to knight you?"

"But yes, Mademoiselle," Francois answered with decision. "I have studied the question, and I believe that the accolade—the knighting—was always a right of the monarchs of France, disused, perhaps at times, but yet held in abeyance, a right."

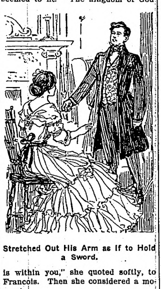
The glance of the brilliant eyes met hers with a frank calmness which showed that he claimed nothing which he did not feel; that this haphazard nobility had lived in his soul and grown with his growth, and come to be part of him. With a gentle humility, very winning as it sprang from his gentle pride, he went on.

"I know, Mademoiselle, that I am a peasant and that I must be content with a small place in life at the present. I know this. And even that position which I have is more than my brothers. For you must know, Mademoiselle, that the others grew up to be farmers or tradesmen." He hesitated, and then in a few words told her of General Gourgaud, the seigneur of Vicques, and how he had given the peasant boy all the opportunities which his own son could have had. And as he talked he remembered how, after his father's ruin, he had stood inside the bare, little, new cottage and watched through the window his mother standing at the gate and talking to the seigneur, who held Lisette's bridle. It seemed to him he could see the dark braided hair of La Claire, coiled around her head, and the deep point of her white neck-handkerchief as she stood with her back to him, and the big bow of the apron tied about her waist. The picture came vividly. And it opened his heart so that he talked on, and told this stranger in a strange land many things that had lain close and silent in his heart. He told her about the general's gruffness, which could not hide his goodness; and how he had come to be the child of the castle as well as of the cottage; something of Pietro also he told her; but he did not mention Alixe.

"You spoke of three children, Monsieur; who was the third?" asked Lucy.

Francois went on as if he had not heard the question. "It was a happy life, Mademoiselle," he said. "And it has been so ever since—even, for the most part, in prison. I have wondered at times if the world is all filled with such kind people as I have met, or if it is just my good luck."

Lucy Hampton had been reading aloud to her sick black mammy that day, and some of the words of the book she had read came to her, and seemed to fit. "The kingdom of God is within you," she quoted softly, to Francois. Then she considered a moment.



Stretched Out His Arm as If to Hold a Sword.

"Monsieur, would it be impertinent for me to ask you a question—a personal question?"

"I think not, Mademoiselle," he smiled at her.

She went on, hesitating a little. "Father was talking of how Prince Louis Bonaparte served, a few years ago, with the Italian revolutionists. I wondered if—if by chance you had fought under him."

He shook his head. "I had not that happiness, Mademoiselle."

"The heir of the Bonapartes now is that Prince Louis Napoleon, is it not?" she questioned.

"Yes, Mademoiselle."

"And he made an attempt on the city of Strasburg a few months ago, and was tried for it—and all that father talked about it so much I could not help knowing a little about it, but I don't remember distinctly."

"But certainly, Mademoiselle. It was the prince."

"Then, haven't they just done something to him? Isn't there something people are interested in just now about that Prince Louis?"

The grave bright smile flashed out at her. "In truth, Mademoiselle, there is. The prince was shipped by his jailers on the frigate Andromede more than four months ago, for what port is unknown. One has not heard of him lately, and there are fears that he may have suffered shipwreck. But I do not fear. It is the hope of France, it is France's destiny which the Andromede carries. It will carry that great cargo safely. The young prince will yet come to his own, and I—and perhaps you, Mademoiselle—who knows?—will cry for him 'Vive l'Empereur'!"

The tone full of feeling thrilled through the girl. She flushed and stammered as she went on, but Francois, carried away by his enthusiasm, did not think of it. "If you will let me ask just one question more, Monsieur, I will promise not to ask any after."

The flicker of amusement lighted his face. "Ask me a thousand, Mademoiselle."

"No, only one. Did that seigneur—that General Gourgaud—did he have any—any daughter?"

The Frenchman rose in a businesslike way, the way of a teacher of language at the end of a lesson.

"One," he answered briefly in a matter-of-fact tone. And then, "Mademoiselle has talked enchantingly well this evening, but I have perhaps talked too much. I may have tired Mademoiselle. I have the honor to wish you a good evening."

His heels together, he stood in the doorway and made his bow. "Au plaisir de vous revoir," he said, and was gone.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Prince Comes.

The glittering morning sunlight of late March flooded the eastern dining-room of Roanoke house. A fire blazed on the hearth; hot dishes steamed on the table; the girl's face, the crackling fire, the polished silver reflected from polished mahogany; the soft shod, solicitous service of a white-aproned negro; all this made the room fragrant with homeliness in spite of the fact that one could see one's breath in the air. But they were used to it—the hardy Virginians of those days of open fires and no furnaces, of many luxuries and few comforts, and in happy ignorance of world progress, they suffered cheerfully and were strong.

Colonel Henry Hampton faced a portrait of the first Hampton of Roanoke, stately with brass buttons and silver lace, set in the panels seventy-five years before. Lucy had concluded her broiled chicken and bacon and hot bread, and now as he, late for breakfast always, followed in her wake, he read the Norfolk and Portsmouth Herald with which a colored boy had that morning ridden out from Norfolk, eight miles away. It was before the time of daily papers, except in a large city or two, and this of once a week was an event; a boy was sent to Norfolk the day before its publication that the colonel might have it at the earliest moment.

"How would you like to see a live prince, Lucy?" he inquired. "The Hereld states that we have one with us, not ten miles from Roanoke. Prince Louis Napoleon was landed from the Andromede, in Norfolk, only yesterday. Poor young man," he went on condescendingly, "he has no money, I understand, and here he is stranded in a strange country with his fortune to make, and no assets but a title. It's little that will help him in the states!"

Colonel Hampton glanced over to see if she were listening to his words of wisdom; he liked an attentive audience. He was enchanted with her expression. She had dropped knife and fork and, with her blue eyes stretched wide, her white teeth shining, was drinking in his sentences.

"Father! Is Prince Louis in Norfolk? How can it be? Monsieur Beaupre was talking to me about him last night, and he did not dream of his coming here. Surely he would have known if the prince were expected."

Colonel Hampton smiled sarcastically. "You will find that your father occasionally knows more than even Monsieur Beaupre, and even on French questions, I may add," he announced, from a mountain height. "But in one point you are right, my dear. The prince was not expected by any one, not even by the great Chevalier Beaupre. He was exiled from France, as you may or may not know, some four and a half months ago, on account of his attempt on Strasburg, and was sent out on the Andromede, with sealed orders. No one knew his destination until he landed, on the twenty-eighth, in Norfolk. There"—the colonel got up and walked to the fireplace and stood with his back to the blaze, and his legs far apart, masterfully. "There, my dear, I have given you a dose of history for a female mind. How are you going to amuse your little self today?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Dreadful.

"Mercy, child!" exclaimed Mrs. Harlem. "I never would have believed my little boy could use such language. Been playing with bad children again, haven't you?" "No'm," replied her little boy. "Teddy Bacon and I have been playing with a parrot his uncle sent him from Chicago."

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County. Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

The city of Minneapolis furnished all the candidates or state offices on the socialist ticket, except one. Lots of Socialist timber down there.

The Socialist party at their Brainard Convention changed the party name from Public Ownership to Socialist Party. That will save lots of confusion at the polls, so that a man who wants to vote the ticket will not have so much trouble finding it, as it would be too bad to have them lose any votes through the inability of its members to find the proper place to vote.

We have heard it rumored that County Attorney Stanton will not seek re-election for the reason that he desires to devote more time to his private practice, and this naturally leads to the question of who will be his successor. Several names have been mentioned, but the one most in evidence is that of H. O. Kjomme. Mr. Kjomme. is a careful and conscientious lawyer, is a student and a thorough gentleman. He is a good mixer and has hosts of friends, and should he conclude to get into the game we are free to predict that he will be very much to the good when the votes are counted.—Thief River Falls News-Press.

AN ANXIOUS SUBSCRIBER.

Editor of The Sunbeam:

Will you please answer through your columns the following question? How does it happen that D. P. O'Neill has the name of being the Representative of the farmers in the Legislature, when his record shows that he voted against the farmers, and in favor of the cities, every time their interests clashed, as he did on that "Seven Senator Bill?"

Anxious Subscriber.

Well that is not a very hard question to answer, if you are at all well acquainted with Mr. O'Neill and his record. We suppose that he got the reputation of being the farmer's representative from his own campaign speeches, as he never misses the opportunity to drive the fact home to an audience of farmers, that he is A FARMER, and that they have no lobbiests at any session of the legislature to look after their interest, and the farmers have swallowed the bait, and voted solid for him.

But after he is elected and gets in sight of the dome of that capital building, he not only forgets the farmers who gave him their votes, but all the rest of his constituents. So smooth did he work his game at the last session of the legislature, that he would undoubtedly have been re-elected this year without opposition, had he not thrown that normal school to Bemidji, instead of Thief River Falls, but his work was so coarse on that subject that even the poor class of politicians, that they have in Thief River Falls "got next" to him.

We shall publish some of his record votes just to show the farmers how he did vote on questions of vital interest to them, a little later on in the campaign. It don't make any differance to us whether you do or do not vote for Mr. O'Neill, but we propose to show you how he betrayed your interests to the twin cities, by publishing his votes, as recorded in the records.

Congressman Steenerson is pushing a bill through congress to restore the homestead right to settlers on the Eleven Towns who never used their free homestead right. This is no more than justice to those who never had used their right to a free homestead before buying land here. But he had ought to also include all of the poor fellows who took a homestead before they took land here, and lost it by mortgage foreclosure. Give all the natural pioneers a chance to again move to the front and take another homestead, after the bankers get the one that they now have.

Bemidji defeated very Socialist candidate for any position at their city election on February 17th. The Socialists seems to be playing in hard luck, since that red flag incident at Crookston last 4th of July. It was admitted that some of the Socialist candidates were better men for the position than the men that defeated them, but Bemidji was determined to put down the red flag and raise the stars and stripes, and "Old Glory" will now float over that city.

The Mexican Rebels butchered one English subject last week, but that don't matter, as there is plenty more of them.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate. I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON,
Thief River Falls, Minn.

THAT WILL BE ENOUGH VOTES FOR HIM.

Thief River Falls News Press:

We understand that Louis Nelson, a former sheriff of Red Lake county, is to file for sheriff at the coming primary election. Mr. Nelson, it is also understood, has affiliated with the Socialist party, and although the primary election is non-partisan, he will undoubtedly have the solid support of the followers of the red flag in his campaign.

TAXPAYERS SHOULD GET BUSY.

(Atwater Republican-Press.)

What our state sadly needs is a more economical administration. Samuel G. Iverson, our present state auditor, who has already announced himself as a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor, says that in his opinion economy and law enforcement are among the paramount issues demanded by the people at this time; that we need to call a halt in all public expenditures, give due consideration to the institutions we now have and apply common sense business principles to their management. Would that we could be sure of electing a governor who would give us the popular government so badly needed! Mr. Iverson in all his experience as a public servant of the great state of Minnesota is certainly in a position to know what remedies are needed, and if he were elected and would give us such an administration as he suggests in the announcement of his candidacy there would be a mighty big change from the present state of affairs.

IVERSON IS PROGRESSIVE.

(St. Paul Pioneer Press.)

The stand taken by State Auditor S. G. Iverson, in defense of the interests of the people of Minnesota in the timber, pine or other, growing on state lands—and in favor of such methods of handling timbered lands as will make them a perpetual rather than a temporary source of revenue—cannot be too highly commended. It stamps the auditor as not merely a conservative but a progressive in his views as to the proper handling of the natural resources of the state. A little variation of this glowing presentment will show the state, fifty years hence, in possession of magnificent areas of thriving forests, the basis of a score of great industries as well as the source of perpetual revenue to the state—said "forests" meanwhile being more thickly inhabited than is the average Southern Minnesota county today. It will also show the burden of taxation for state purposes to have entirely disappeared; the revenues from its natural endowments, and from franchises based on natural opportunities, sufficing to keep Minnesota in the vanguard of progressive states. And in the distribution of honors for the attainment of such now prospective results, coming generations will award no small share to S. G. Iverson.

A JUST AND CAPABLE MAN.

(Rochester Bulletin.)

The news of Mr. Iverson's candidacy sets at rest many rumors that have emanated from the state capitol and will be greeted with satisfaction by all who have watched Mr. Iverson's course in office. No more just or capable man ever aspired to the office and with him in the governor's chair there would be an end of vacillation. Mr. Iverson has the qualifications of a real leader and the announcement of his candidacy has been received with much enthusiasm by Mr. Iverson's many friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Causin, visited at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Hunt, on Sunday afternoon.

If you have not yet got up your summers's supply of ice now is the time to get it before it all floats down the river.

There is to be a big masquerade ball at P. L. Wojnarowski's on section 8, town of Hickory tomorrow night.

We are indebted to the Thief River Falls News Press for the half tone cut published in another column advertising the Pennington County corn exhibit.

Read the new add in another column of this issue of The High Landing Cash Store, then call and see them and take advantage of some of the bargains offered.

The weather turned mild yesterday and our short run of sleighing begins to leave the ground, and the farmers are beginning to get ready for spring's work.

There is the usual number of auction sales this spring of people who are going to dispose of surplus stock and farm machinery and all of the sales seem to be well attended by people who want to buy.

We noticed a broad smile on the face of our friend Gunder Asbjornson, last Saturday morning and on inquiring the cause, found that a brand new daughter of Standard weight had arrived at his home the night before. His post office address is Malone, Minnesota.

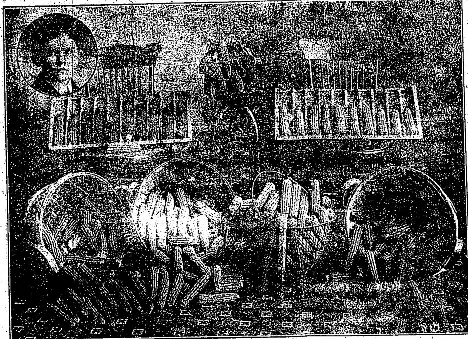
Halverson and Thoreson are the new mercantile firm's name who will succeed Vaughan Bros. and Co. at Highlanding. They are putting in a big stock of goods and will no doubt do a big business. Watch these columns for their new add which will appear next week.

W. H. Wilde, came up from Grand Forks yesterday, and will now reside on his farm on sec. 1 town of Mayfield, As soon as he gets his house repaired Mrs. Wilde and the family will move up and make their permanent residence here. He will break up a lot of land for flax this spring.

The P. L. Wojnarowski auction sale held last Wednesday was one of the largest attended auction sales ever held in this locality, and all stock, and farm machinery sold at good prices, except horses, as the crowd seemed to be well supplied with them. Mr. Wojnarowski will farm one of his farms himself this season, and did not sell his horses at the prices offered. However he got rid of a large amount of surplus truck at good prices, which accumulates on any farm, or in other words, "The articles too numerous to mention," brought good prices.

William Causin received notice last Friday that the General Land Office, had sustained the decision of the Crookston Land Office in his contest with William Fuller, involving the title to the S. W. ¼ of Section 26, town of Kratka. The case has been appealed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in order to cause more delay. If the decisions on this case can be reversed then it is not necessary to make any residence on a homestead to hold it, as the Defendent in this case did not appear at the trial, and did not have any evidence that he ever slept one night on the claim, or ever eat a meal on the land.

Pennington County Prize Corn.



Some Minnesota Corn.

Edwin Anderson, age 14, son of A. E. Anderson, a well known farmer living in town of Rocksbury three miles southwest of Thief River Falls was the winner in the 1913 corn growing contest among the school children of Pennington county, Minnesota. That he won this honor in a field of thirty two contestants is evidence of the skill and labor expended in the effort.

This contest was similar to those carried on in other counties in the state and was directed by the agricultural department of the Thief River Falls High School which is known as a Putnam Agricultural high school.

The varieties of corn planted by the youthful competitors consisted chiefly of Northwestern, Minnesota 23 and Minn. 13. Anderson won with the second named corn. The corn shown in the wire basket was the corn grown by young Anderson, and the small inset picture is Edwin Anderson.—T. R. Falls News Press.

BUSINESSLIKE WAY.

(Barnum Herald.)

Samuel G. Iverson, our present state auditor, and also for the past ten years, evidently believes in the saying that "the early bird catches the worm." For he has come out already announcing his candidacy for the Republican nomination for governor. There are sure to be others and they will not be long finding out that Mr. Iverson is as wise as any of them in handling state politics and knows the game from A to Z. His businesslike way and carefulness in dealing with buyers of state lands alone has gained for him a reputation and acquaintanceship with the people of Northern Minnesota that will count at the primary.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

STATE REVENUES $17,152,000 IN 1914

WILL SHOW BIG INCREASE ACCORDING TO ESTIMATES FOR THIS YEAR.

TWO YEAR GAIN IS $3,632,000

Members of Economy and Efficiency Body Say Reorganization is Needed to Handle Big Sums Properly.

St. Paul.—Minnesota will receive from taxation and other revenue sources approximately $17,152,000 during 1914, according to a table prepared by Secretary J. S. Pardee of the State Efficiency and Economy commission. The startling growth of the state's income is indicated by a comparison with 1912, when the total was but $13,520,000. Mr. Pardee's estimate, although most conservative, shows an increase of $3,632,000 in the course of two years.

Will Study Expenditures.

The next task before the commission and its secretary is to analyze the method of disposing of these funds. The members are trying to find out exactly what is done with the money thus collected, where it goes and the work it accomplishes. When this is ascertained the commission believes it will be able better to suggest economy measures.

A comparison of receipts between the 1913 and 1914 estimates is interesting.

	1913.	1914.
Railroad gross earnings	$4,325,000	$4,500,000
Other special taxes	818,000	800,000
Department fees.	306,000	300,000
Institutional earnings	995,000	900,000
Unclassified items	609,000	600,000
Accruals, trust funds	1,352,000	1,400,000
Trust fund income	1,088,000	1,100,000
General tax levy.	3,218,000	5,380,000
School and university tax....	1,422,000	1,722,000
Inheritance tax..	437,000	450,000

Some Items Lower.

As will be seen the 1914 estimate in several instances is placed below that of 1913, although the chances are that in these particular items the receipts will average about the same as they did last year.

What the state will be receiving in the course of another decade is hard to estimate, but a conservative figure would be $30,000,000, according to members of the commission. They point out that this large increase in receipts is one of the real reasons why the government system of the state should be so reorganized.

VALLEY COUNTIES FORM CLUB

Red River Valley Organization Perfected by Ten—First Meeting in June.

Crookston.—The Minnesota Red River Valley Farm Development association, comprising Clay, Becker, Norman, Polk, Mahnomen, Red Lake, Pennington, Roseau, Marshall and Kittson counties, was organized by the election of the following officers: President, Leslie Welter, Moorhead; vice president, Dan Robertson, Argyle; treasurer, H. L. Wood, Warren; secretary, G. Selvig, Crookston; executive board, T. M. Greene, Hallock; Tim Chilten, Frazee; B. Gaas, Red Lake Falls; C. H. Pitkin, Thief River Falls; A. J. Anderson, Mahnomen; A. D. Van Syckle, Warren; Mike Holm, Roseau; H. F. Sprung, Ada; A. H. Costain, Moorhead, and N. J. Nelson, East Grand Forks.

It was decided also to hold the annual meeting of the association at Moorhead, June 18.

The association also pledged co-operation in making the June meeting of the Northern Minnesota Development association a success.

Would Manage City Plant.

Fergus Falls.—The Otter Tail Power company, which has just completed a power project here, and which sells electricity to the city for the municipal lighting plant, has stirred up a fight by offering to take over the management of the city lighting system, and guaranteeing to reduce the rates of lighting at least one-third, and possibly one-half.

Morris Raises Money Easily.

Morris.—Citizens have decided that club rooms are necessary for properly carrying on the work of the Morris Improvement union and have raised $1,300 to equip the rooms. The ease with which the money was raised illustrates the spirit of community co-operation that has been in evidence ever since the first plans were made for the recent corn and alfalfa exposition given here under the auspices of the West Central Minnesota Development association.

BREAD CONTEST IS STARTED

$500 in Prizes Offered for Best Girl Bakers by State Farm School.

Minneapolis.—Minnesota makes the finest butter in the world, she sets the standard for all other states and nations in the manufacture of bread flour, and now it is the ambition of the state agricultural college authorities to produce from her farm homes and public schools the best bread.

Prof. A. D. Wilson, chief of the agricultural extension division, has announced a statewide breadmaking contest in which all girls between 10 and 18 years of age on July 1 will be eligible for competition, and prizes amounting to $500, with two grand championship sweepstakes prizes of free trips to Washington, will be distributed among the winners.

T. A. Erickson, rural school specialist of the agricultural college, will have charge of the contest. He says that 4,000 girls will enter. Miss Marion Haycraft of Madelia, Minn., has the honor of being the first to file as a competitor.

The contest will be held with the local school or community as a unit. No entry fee will be charged. The extension division is sending out scientific recipes and full directions prepared under the supervision of Miss Josephine T. Berry, chief of the division of home economics.

NATIVE SONS TO ASSEMBLE

Thirteenth Annual Dinner Will Be Held in Minneapolis Evening Of March 3.

Minneapolis.—The Native Sons of Minnesota will hold their thirteenth annual dinner and meeting at the West hotel here, March 3, at 6:30 p. m. The affair will be informal, and an interesting program has been arranged for the occasion.

Congressman George R. Smith will deliver an address, "The Native Sons of Minnesota; Its Functions and its Possibilities." Judge W. C. Leary will make a few remarks dealing particularly with "Alexander Ramsey." Frank G. O'Brien is scheduled for some "Reminiscences." Dr. W. E. Leonard's topic is "New Pictures of Old Minneapolis."

The present officers of the association are: C. E. Van Cleve, president; J. J. McHale, first vice president; J. T. Elwell, second vice president David G. Gorham, secretary; Frank L. Gowan, treasurer.

Teachers Meet at Marshall.

Warren.—The annual Marshall county teachers' and school officers' convention was held here. About 200 teachers and officers were present. The Commercial club held a public reception Thursday evening at which the domestic science class of North Star college served. The program for the two days included lectures by Superintendent J. H. Hay, Thief River Falls; Superintendent Frank Koos, Stephen; Charles A. Payne, extension division, University of Minnesota; Superintendent Hayes, Hallock; T. A. Erickson, extension division, University of Minnesota; C. G. Schulz, state superintendent of education; H. M. Bracken, secretary of the state board of health, and O. E. Abrahamson, president of North Star college.

$1,000 Minnesota Ear Stolen.

Dallas, Texas.—An ear of corn from Minnesota, known at exhibitions as "The $1,000 ear," one of the attractions at the National Corn exposition here, was stolen. J. J. Furlong, president of the Minnesota state fair, in charge of the ear, informed the police it was taken from a desk in the lobby of a hotel here. James J. Hill was awarded a prize of $1,000 for this ear, which is fourteen inches long. It was Mr. Hill's property.

Aged Publisher Dies.

Lake Crystal.—George W. Neff, aged 78 years, died at his home in Lake Crystal after a short illness, due to a general breaking down of health. In 1866 he went to Mankato, Minn., and established the Union, which he conducted until 1882, when he came to Lake Crystal and began the publication of the Lake Crystal Union. He was twice elected mayor here and was mayor at the time of his death.

Fire Loss Shows Decrease.

St. Paul.—There was a reduction in fire losses in Minnesota during January of $47,420, compared to figures for the corresponding period a year ago, according to the report filed by Charles E. Keller, state fire marshal. There were 218 fires reported in the state during the month with a loss of $318,421. Figures for January, 1913, show that there were 225 fires with a loss of $365,841.

Winona Plans "White Way."

Winona.—Preliminary plans have been worked out for the establishment of a "white way" in Winona. The city does not feel financially able to undertake the plan, so a White Way association, recently formed, has started a canvass for subscriptions for the installation of street lamps in the downtown district for a period of three years, after which it is expected the plant will be taken over by the city. The subscriptions are being taken on the basis of a 25 per cent payment at the start.

ST. PAUL OFFICIALS ARE FOUND GUILTY

FLANAGAN AND TURNER CONVICTED AFTER JURY IS OUT 28 HOURS.

VERDICT SHOCKS DEFENDANTS

Disagreement Was Considered Certain by Them After Long Deliberation—Get an Indeterminate Sentence.

St. Paul, Feb. 21.—Martin Flanagan, former chief of police and Fred Turner, a former detective of St. Paul, were found guilty of sharing in $3,000 paid by Ida Dorsey of Minneapolis for the privilege of opening a resort in St. Paul.

The jury came in with its verdict after a deliberation of 28 hours.

Get Indeterminate Sentences.

Both were given indeterminate sentences of not more than ten years in the state penitentiary at Stillwater by Judge P. W. Morrison in the Ramsey county district court. Bonds were fixed by the court at $10,000 in each case and stay of execution for the purpose of appeal was granted until April 4. In default of bonds, following the arraignmnt, both men were remanded to the custody of the sheriff and placed in the Ramsey county jail.

The verdict was a shock to Flanagan and Turner. Flanagan was at home when the jury came in. It was some time before he reached the court house. When the foreman of the jury announced "guilty" in the stilled courtroom, both Flanagan and Turner started. Their attorneys, McElwee and Payte, were visibly astonished. Disagreement was the accepted prediction when an early verdict was not reported.

Appeal is to be made on the ground that John Buschmann, one of the jurors, as it was found after the trial was begun, is a convicted felon serving a suspended sentence for grand larceny, and was not qualified to serve on the jury. C. C. McElwee, senior counsel for the defense, said that he would contend that Buschmann was intimidated by the court.

The Second Trial.

The trial just ended was the second in which the former St. Paul police officials were charged with graft. They were acquitted at the first trial.

In the second trial Ida Dorsey testified that she had paid $3,000 for the privilege of opening a resort in St. Paul; Nina Clifford and May Burke that they distributed it. It was alleged that the defendants received shares.

P. J. Ryan, assistant county attorney, reiterated the statement of the prosecution at the close of the trial that it would be satisfied with any verdict. "It is probable the defendants will not be brought to trial on any other charges," he said.

Defense Counsel Wrathy.

E. H. Payte of the defense counsel was stunned, then wrathy. "If public officials are to be convicted on the testimony of such witnesses as were brought by the state in this case, then it is unsafe for any man to hold office," he said.

Flanagan served the St. Paul police department 19 years. He was put on as sergeant. He never walked a beat. About six months ago he was removed under charges as acting chief. He held that rank two years.

Turner was a city detective two years. He was removed by the police board at the time of Flanagan's dismissal.

Primary Law is Upheld.

Minneapolis.—The new Minnesota primary election law providing for nonpartizan elections for county officials was held valid by Judge Charles S Jelley of the district court in deciding a test case brought against County Auditor Al P. Erickson by N. Frederick Olson who sought to compel the auditor to allow him to file for the legislature as a democrat. An appeal will be taken to the supreme court. While Judge Jelley held the law valid, he declared that he had some grave doubts of its validity, but that he had followed the usual court rule of consulting the reasonable doubts in favor of the constitutionality of the act.

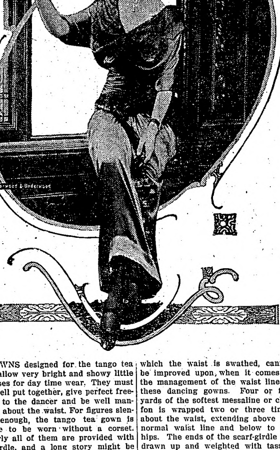
Prominent Albert Lea Citizen Dies.

Albert Lea.—Soren K. Swenson president of the Albert Lea Gas Light company, is dead of typhoid fever. He was well known throughout the state.

St. Cloud Elks Celebrate.

St. Cloud.—In the presence of 400 members of the antlered tribe, the beautiful new home of St. Cloud Elks was dedicated. Delegations from Minneapolis, St. Paul, Little Falls, Brainerd, Melrose and surrounding towns were present. A special train was run from Willmar. State Senator Charles D. Johnson of Brainerd, district deputy grand exalted ruler for northern Minnesota, conducted the ceremony. A. H. Hall of Minneapolis delivered the dedication address.

Pretty Gown for the Tango Tea



GOWNS designed for the tango tea allow very bright and showy little dresses for day time wear. They must be well put together, give perfect freedom to the dancer and be well managed about the waist. For figures slender enough, the tango tea gown is made to be worn without a corset. Nearly all of them are provided with a girdle, and a long story might be written on the subject of the girdle alone, for they appear in an endless variety of styles.

Where the waist and bodice are made separately, it is best to sew the skirt to an underwaist instead of a belt. This will prevent the skirt and bodice from parting company during some extra-strenuous figure of the dance. A plain corset cover serves to support the skirt. By sewing eyes at the waist line into which little hooks on the bodice will fasten, the waist and skirt are joined before the girdle is placed.

Skirts for tango dancing are most satisfactory made of accordion plaited fabrics, very light in weight. They set close to the figure and the spreading of the plaits when dancing gives the requisite freedom of movement.

Overdraperies of lace and bodices almost entirely made of lace predominate in these gowns. Chiffon taffeta promises to be the most favored of all fabrics for these pretty and frivolous afternoon costumes. It is almost as light in weight as chiffon and has a splendid lustre.

Wide, soft girdles, very long, in which the waist is swathed, cannot be improved upon, when it comes to the management of the waist line in these dancing gowns. Four or five yards of the softest messaline or chiffon is wrapped two or three times about the waist, extending above the normal waist line and below to the hips. The ends of the scarf-girdle are drawn up and weighted with tassels or ornaments. Such a girdle is shown in the gown pictured here.

Much has been written about the tango dancing which is hardly deserved. It is a romping sort of dance, a frolic, in fact, but some of the new steps are very graceful and more like the old minuet figures than any other modern dance. At all events, the tango and other similar dances are gaining ground and the chances are will result in some very new and pretty dancing steps and figures.

The clothing of the feet also calls for much attention. The same rule applies here—perfect fit with ease and freedom. There are slippers especially well adapted to tango dancing, made to be adjusted very securely, and to be at once soft and shapely.

After these requirements of the tango tea have been fulfilled and the pretty dancer has learned how comfortably she may be clad and still look trim and graceful—it will be a hard matter to persuade her to wear anything but the most comfortable corsets with either her street or house gowns.

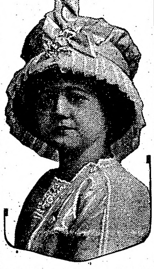
SUMMER MILLINERY APPROPRIATE FOR CHILDREN'S WEAR

FOR spring time and summer wear specialists in children's millinery have prepared a greater variety in hats than has been shown in previous seasons.



With all the different shapes, nothing appeals more generally than the hats, or bonnets, made with puffed crown, of silk and falling plaited ruffles of lace. Collars and bows of ribbon and bunches of small flowers trim these models, and, in fact, nearly all others.

There is nothing new in this assembling of materials, but the management of them, the new ways of making bows, and the novelty in the fabrics themselves, contrive to make the spring millinery for children the most pleasing that has been shown for many seasons.

A pretty example of the Corday hat is shown in the picture. It will be noticed that the puffed crown is rather small, and that the ribbon bow is wired and is in effect an ornament finished with small bows and flowers, belonging to those classed as "stick-ups" by milliners.

Besides these shapes, with which we are familiar, for children, there are many others in hemp, and other braids that are novel. They are considerably like the shape made for grown-ups, and look very "cunning" for the little people, being minatures of some of the simpler shapes which grown people wear.

Jet Again to be Fashionable.

Black jewelry is to be in vogue in the spring, and already black enamel, onyx, and jet are being widely purchased. "Jet has been out of fashion for several years," it was stated at a Regent street establishment, "but now it is rapidly returning to favor, together with other black jewelery. We are selling jet tiaras copied from a diamond tiara belonging to the Czarina of Russia, and long jet chains Whitby jet is used most, being more substantial than the French kind. Jet is not expensive, and is not likely at present to rise in price, but one can pay as much as $25 for a chain of this material." Jet is to be used a great deal in dress trimmings, it is stated, and consequently black jewelry and ornaments are worn to match. One large city firm is preparing thousands of jet ornaments. Some of these are in slab form, others in bell shape.—London Times.

Fabric Flowers.

Blue velvet poppies with square-cut petals, full-blown roses in dark blue velvet, blue velvet begonias, blue taffeta flowers and blue tulle clematis are worn with day and evening costumes. Yellow flowers are the next in prominence and include taffeta poppies, roses, clematis and begonias. Sweet peas in their various colorings are also much worn. Many flowers are ornamented with semi-precious stones, especially those worn in the evening.

No Cheeseparer.

The late George A. Hearn, the New York millionaire art collector, was noted for his generosity to his employes.

To a reporter who once congratulated Mr. Hearn on the high wages and unusual comfort that his employes received, Mr. Hearn said:

"I don't believe in cheeseparing economy in the treatment of those whose hard work makes a man's success. Cheeseparing economy, applied in that way, seems to me as mean and paltry as the Yonkers man.

"A Yonkers man was summoned from his evening paper by his wife's frightened cry:

"'George, come quick! The cook has tried to kill herself inhaling gas!'

"'Good gracious!' growled George, as he rushed to the kitchen, leaped over the cook's prostrate form, and turned off the cock—'good gracious, think what the gas bill will be this month!'"—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Watch Carefully the Child's Diet

Start Them Off Right With a Good Laxative and Then Watch Their Food.

Mothers are often unconsciously very careless about the diet of their children, forcing all to eat the same foods. The fact is that all foods do not agree alike with different persons. Hence, avoid what seems to constipate the child or to give it indigestion, and urge it to take more of what is quickly digested.

If the child shows a tendency to constipation it should immediately be given a mild laxative to help the bowels. By this is not meant a physic or purgative, for these should never be given to children, nor anything like salts, pills, etc. What the child requires is simply a small dose of the gentlest of medicines, such as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which, in the opinion of thousands of watchful mothers, is the ideal remedy for any child showing a tendency to constipation. So many things can happen to a constipated child that care is necessary. Colds, piles, headaches, sleeplessness, and many other annoyances that children should not have can usually be traced to constipation.

Many of America's foremost families are never without Syrup Pepsin, because one can never tell when some member of the family may need it, and all can use it. Thousands endorse it, among them Mrs. M. E. Patten, Valley Junction, Iowa, who is never without it in the house. Mrs. Patten says that Syrup Pepsin has done wonders for her boy Ralph, who was constipated from birth but is now doing fine. Naturally, she is enthusiastic about it and wants other mothers to use it. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is sold by druggists at fifty cents and one dollar a bottle, the latter size being bought by those who already know its value, and it contains proportionately more.

Everyone likes Syrup Pepsin, as it is very pleasant to the taste. It is also mild and non-griping and free from injurious ingredients.

To Keep Bacon From Curling.

"But bacon curls up so when it is sliced very thing," protested a young thick slices of bacon. The way to avoid that annoying curling is to have the frying pan very hot and turn the slices before the meat sears on the under side and begins to curl. By constant attention and turning the thinnest slices can be broiled brown, crisp and straight.—Nebraska Farmer.

ENDS BACKACHE AND KIDNEY DISORDERS

Croxone Helps Lifeless Organs Regain Health, Strength and Activity.

It is useless, dangerous and unnecessary to be tortured with the digging, twisting pains of backache or suffer disagreeable kidney and bladder disorders when Croxone is guaranteed to promptly and surely relieve all such misery.

Croxone masters these troubles because it quickly reaches the cause of the disease. It soaks right into the stopped-up, inactive kidneys, through the membranes and linings; cleans out the little filtering glands; neutralizes and dissolves the poisonous uric acid and makes the kidneys filter and sift from the blood the waste and poisonous matter that clog the system and cause such troubles.

It does not matter whether you have but slight symptoms or a chronic, aggravated case, it is practically impossible to take Croxone without results.

An original package of Croxone costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if you are not entirely satisfied the very first time you use it.—Adv.

FACE BROKE OUT IN PIMPLES

Falls City, Neb.—"My trouble began when I was about sixteen. My face broke out in little pimples at first. They were red and sore and then became like little boils. It was a source of continual annoyance to me, as my face was always red and splotched and burned all the time.

"I tried ——, —— and others, but I could find nothing to cure it. I had been troubled about two years before I found Cuticura Soap and Ointment. MAKING COLD FRAMES Device Consists of Framework or Bottomless Box.

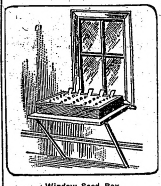
No Secret or Difficulty in Establishing Successful Hotbed on the Farm—Ample Supply of Manure Is Necessary.

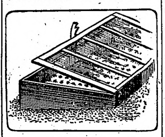
It is not too early to consider the making of cold frames and hotbeds. I have seen pansies in blossom in New York state in midwinter when the bed was protected with a cold frame. This cold frame simply consists of a framework or bottomless box covered with glass. This glass-covered cold frame is placed over the bed desiring to be protected and manure or leaves or earth is placed around the outside of the base to keep the cold wind from entering next to the ground. An inexperienced person would be surprised at the warmth and growth of hardy plants inside of such a cold frame during the winter months, says a writer in Green's Fruit Grower.



Window Seed Box.

The hotbed is more often constructed on the farm than the cold frame. When living on the farm I was deeply interested in the hotbed. It was a pleasure to see the seeds sprout and grow vigorously when everything outside was seemingly cold and dead.

There is no secret or difficulty in establishing a successful hotbed on the farm. All that is needed is an ample supply of fresh horse manure, which can be stacked to a depth of two or three feet after having been thoroughly trodden down. On top of this a bottomless box is placed and on top of this box or frame are placed the sash and glass. All should be close fitted to prevent the entrance of cold air and frost.



Cold Frame.

The surface of the manure is covered with good rich garden soil to the depth of four or five inches. The manure will begin to heat within a week after the bed is completed. The seed should not be sown for several days after the bed is finished. If very cold weather ensues after plants have come up it may be necessary to cover the glass on very cold nights with blankets or matting. It may be necessary to shade the plants on the brightest sunniest days at midday when the air in the hotbed may become too hot. Do not give the bed too much water, which is worse than too little. Plants usually started in the farmer's hotbed are lettuce, radish, tomato, cucumber, melon, eggplant and cabbage.

FEEDING MEAT TO POULTRY

Green Bone Freshly Cut Just Before Feeding Is Quite Beneficial—Judgment Must Be Used.

Meat in some form must be fed to poultry. They must have animal matter. Fowls running on free ranges where insects are plentiful obtain a sufficient supply of animal matter, but those kept in closer quarters must be given this food in another form. Finely chopped fresh meat is an excellent bone and muscle builder for the young stock, but should not be fed more often than two or three times a week. Green bone freshly cut just before feeding, is equally as beneficial, but also be fed with judgment as to how much and how often. Meat foods assist feather, bone, muscle and comb development, consequently too much is apt to cause too much forcing along these lines.

Rusty Mold Boards.

Rusty mold boards and cultivator shovels are an awful nuisance, and it requires hours of hard horse and man work to clean them. A very little hot paraffine brushed over them when put away keeps the iron as bright as we wish and the minute we start all goes well. Paraffine costs less than the cuss words the hired man has to use to get the rust off.

Early Celery.

Early celery is a profitable crop where it can be grown successfully. The grower should be very careful to buy the best seed of an improved strain or variety. A constant supply of moisture during the entire period of growth in the field is highly essential to success.

WESTERN CANADA CAME INTO EVIDENCE

AT THE CRUCIAL PERIOD FOR SUPPLY OF WORLD'S FOODSTUFFS.

The present demand for foodstuffs in all parts of the world, and the expense of producing it on high-priced lands, would make it seem that western Canada came into evidence at the crucial period. There is to be found the opportunity that will be a large factor in meeting this demand. With its millions of acres of land, easily cultivatable, highly productive, accessible to railways, and with unexcelled climatic conditions, the opportunities that are offered and afforded are too great to be overlooked.

There have been booms in almost every civilized country and they were looked upon as such, and in the course of time the bubble was pricked and was burst. But in no country has the development been as great nor as rapid, whether in city or in country, as in western Canada.

The provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta have the largest area of desirable lands on the North American continent, and their cultivation has just begun.

Even with a two hundred million bushel wheat crop, less than eight per cent. of the land is under the ploughs, four per cent. being in wheat. Less than five years ago the wheat crop was only 71,000,000 bushels. It is a simple calculation to estimate that if four per cent. of the available cultivatable area produces something over 200,000,000 bushels, what will 44 per cent. produce? And then look at the immigration that is coming into the country. In 1901 it was 49,149, 17,000 being from the United States; in 1906 it was 189,064, of which 57,000 were Americans, and in 1913 it was about 400,000, of which about 140,000 were Americans. But why have they gone to Canada? The American farmer is a man of shrewd business instincts, just like his Canadian brother, and when he finds that he can sell his own farm at from $100 to $200 per acre and move into Canada and homestead and pre-empt half a section for himself, and similarly for all his sons who are adult and of age upon lands as rich and fertile as those he left, and producing indeed several bushels to the acre in excess of anything he has ever known, it will take more than an ordinary effort to prevent him from making the change.

And then, too, there is the American capital following the capital of brawn, muscle and sinew, following it so as to keep in touch with the industrious farmer with which it has had dealings for years back. This capital and the capital of farming experience is no small matter in the building up of a country.

Nothing is said of the great mineral and forest wealth, of which but little has been touched.

No country in the world's history has attracted to its borders a larger number of settlers in so short a time, or has attracted so much wealth in a period of equal length, as have the Canadian prairies. Never before has pioneering been accomplished under conditions so favorable as those that exist in western Canada today.—Advertisement.

Sick Women Made Well

Reliable evidence is abundant that women are constantly being restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

The many testimonial letters that we are continually publishing in the newspapers—hundreds of them—are all genuine, true and unsolicited expressions of heartfelt gratitude for the freedom from suffering that has come to these women solely through the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Money could not buy nor any kind of influence obtain such recommendations; you may depend upon it that any testimonial we publish is honest and true—if you have any doubt of this write to the women whose true names and addresses are always given, and learn for yourself.

Read this one from Mrs. Waters:

CAMDEN, N.J.—"I was sick for two years with nervous spells, and my kidneys were affected. I had a doctor all the time and used a galvanic battery, but nothing did me any good. I was not able to go to bed, but spent my time on a couch or in a sleeping-chair, and soon became almost a skeleton. Finally my doctor went away for his health, and my husband heard of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and got me some. In two months I got relief and now I am like a new woman and am at my usual weight. I recommend your medicine to every one and so does my husband."—MRS. TILLIE WATERS, 1135 Knight St., Camden, N.J.

And this one from Mrs. Haddock:

UTICA, OKLA.—"I was weak and nervous, not able to do my work and scarcely able to be on my feet. I had backache, headache, palpitation of the heart, trouble with my bowels, and inflammation. Since taking the Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I am better than I have been for twenty years. I think it is a wonderful medicine and I have recommended it to others."—MRS. MARY ANN HADDOCK, Utica, Oklahoma.

Now answer this question if you can. Why should a woman continue to suffer without first giving Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial? You know that it has saved many others—why should it fail in your case?

For 30 years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been the standard remedy for female ills. No one sick with woman's ailments does justice to herself if she does not try this famous medicine made from roots and herbs, it has restored so many suffering women to health.

Write to LYDIA E. PINKHAM MEDICINE CO. (CONFIDENTIAL) LYNN, MASS., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

The young woman laughed and blushed for pleasure.

"Oh, go on," said she.

400,000 Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position.

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessable a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

A Bid for a Throne

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

We were in South Russia—that southernmost portion of the vast empire where the black earth yields two harvests a year and the grape ripens, the pleasant land which the Romans colonized and which their descendants, the Roumanians of today, inhabit, though under Russian rule. We were at Kishineff.

I knew that beneath his cynicism and contempt, Nikolai cherished an unappeasable love for the land of his birth. That was the magnet that had drawn him back. Exiled in childhood, his father's vast lands confiscated on account of his adhesion to the abortive insurrection of 1863, he had returned a dozen times to aid the people of his unhappy country, risking imprisonment and death.

This was during the blackest year of the reign of Nicholas, when the land groaned beneath his oppression and his troops, desperately resolved to crush out the revolt, diverted the hatred and prejudices of the mobs by organizing massacres of the Jews at their ruler's command.

All through the district the massacres had spread, from the borders of Germany to the south. Everywhere fire and the sword had made women widows and children fatherless; age nor sex was sacred to the fanatics.

It was because they were heart and soul with the movement for freedom that the czar let loose his hordes upon these people. And every time a new report of a revolted city reached the despot, cowering in his palace upon the Baltic's shores, the order went forth for another riot of blood.

We had reached Kishineff, the scene of the first slaughter, in the guise of American commercial agents. Even yet the streets bore witness to the scenes of violence that had occurred. Windows were still broken, doors burst in, ominous splashes of blood showed darkly upon ledges and stairs. And the czar's yoke was still heavy upon the victims of his fury.

And yet again he planned to let loose his soldiery and his Black Hundreds. Whispers of a coming massacre were everywhere. We heard them in our hotel; they floated up to our windows through the still, summer air; strangers ceased speaking and looked at us with startled eyes as we passed them. Most ominous of all, bars of thick steel fastened the shuttered doors of houses and churches.

Krushevan, the organizer of the last massacre, wrote in his newspaper:

"The time has come to make an end of these traitors to church and czar. We wait only the word of our illustrious ruler. Humbly, with bared heads and throbbing hearts, we await it. May it come soon!"

Nikolai flung the sheet away as though it were something venomous and unclean, rested his chin upon his hands and remained silent, motionless as a statue for a long time. At last he roused himself and burst into such a torrent of execration that I trembled for fear his words would reach the ears of some spy lurking behind the thin partitions of our bedroom walls.

"It is the desperation of impotence, Summers," he said to me when he grew calmer. "The monster's throne is tottering. You know that the people are armed, that a new spirit of reprisal has taken hold of them, that they are prepared to resist massacre more desperately than their forefathers resisted Titus and his Romans. If this determination could be turned into the right channels, the imperial throne would fall.

"Look at the facts, Summers," he continued. "Five millions of them are shut into a small square of Russian territory. They number at least half, often three-fourths of all the population of the cities. They are organized and their adversaries are not. Russia is splitting into fragments. Five million—an army of five hundred thousand men, more than the Arabs were who overran Europe and threw down the thrones of a dozen emperors—why should they not suffice to set Russia free and establish themselves as a nation?"

He lit a cigar, puffed at it furiously and strode up and down the room.

"Now is the time," he cried. "Let them rise here in Kishineff and fifty cities will follow their example. They need but some leader, some opportunity."

And, knowing Nikolai, I knew that already he dreamed of himself as both that leader and that opportunity. But I said nothing, and presently he outlined to me the plan he had formed.

The people of Kishineff, he said, were organized under the leadership of Rabbi Jacob, a man of middle age, whose intense piety nevertheless had not prevented him from identifying himself secretly with the revolutionary cause. While they dwelt on friendly terms with their Russian and Roumanian neighbors, it needed but a few drinks of vodka and a few words from the priests of the Greek churches to rouse the latter's murderous instincts. Suppose, said Nikolai, that both of these parties could be incited to attack the persecuted quarter, under the belief that its denizens were arming against them. Suppose the attack was timed so that they would meet in the dark and each mistake the other for its hated enemy. They would fall upon one another and mutually annihilate each other. Then the downtrodden would be masters of the situation; the Russians and Roumanians would both be at their mercy! And since the civil and the military governors of Kishineff were at loggerheads, his purpose could be more readily attained.

It was useless to attempt to oppose Nikolai's imperious will. As he grew cooler, he became more resolute. And on the following afternoon I yielded to his proposals. That evening, wearing the uniform of a member of the Committee on Internal Affairs at St. Petersburg, and passing under the name of Captain Linovieff, Nikolai entered the grounds of the civil governor's palace, I being in attendance as his orderly, and sent up his card to that official.

After an endless time he came out from the dinner table. A party was being held, and I heard the laughter of ladies and the mirthful voices of officers within. The governor was inclined to be curt, but a glance at Nikolai's uniform reduced him to a condition of deference. He sat down a little heavily, as though he had been drinking, and motioned to Nikolai to be seated also. I stood at attention behind my master.

"What can I do for your excellency?" the governor asked, "before you join our party?"

"My task accomplished, I must return to St. Petersburg at once," said Nikolai harshly. "Governor, how long are you going to let this brood of vipers hatch out their plots beneath the windows of your palace?"

The governor waved his hands in deprecation. "Had I my way, I would smoke out the rabble," he murmured. "But you know, excellency, how our monarch is abused by the press of England and America. We must be cautious!"

"I shall communicate your refusal to his majesty," said Nikolai with a bow, making as if to withdraw.

"Wait! Wait!" screamed the governor. "Your excellency did not deign to tell me that this was his majesty's command."

"The Little Father has no need to command," said Nikolai coldly. "His willing servants wait upon his nod and read his thoughts before they reach his lips."

"It shall be done," cried the governor in panic. "We shall make a more thorough job of it this time. If only the soldiers leave the police to finish—"

"The police will do nothing," responded Nikolai. "You will pass the word to the Greek bishop of the Russian community. He will see to it. He has his orders. And your task will be to see that the police are passive and do not restrain the rioters. And, above all, say nothing to General Baratoff, the military governor, for he is under suspicion of being lukewarm where the czar's interests are concerned."

"Rely on me," replied the governor, winking. "He will go mad with jealousy when he learns the truth. When is it to be?"

"Five nights hence, when the moon is late in rising. Let the rabble arrive at midnight, all armed, at the south corner of the great square."

"It shall be done," cried the governor, rubbing his hands. "And now, captain, you will take a glass of wine with the ladies?"

"I regret that I cannot," Nikolai answered. "I must leave for the capital at once. My droschky waits to convey me to the station. Farewell; see that you do not disappoint the czar, or your place will be endangered."

And he withdrew, while I marched after him looking neither to the right nor the left until we reached the street below the palace. Then I burst into laughter. But Nikolai was in no mood for laughter.

"Now for the military governor," he said. And we set off for his headquarters on the opposite edge of the town.

General Baratoff had retired to bed by the time we arrived and came down blinking like an owl. His military service had been performed in St. Petersburg; he was a favorite of the royal family and had never seen real service in his life. His sole exploits had been against his fellow countrymen.

"General Baratoff," said Nikolai, "five nights hence, at midnight, before the moon comes up, the sheep will fall upon the wolves and make an end of them."

General Baratoff was wide awake upon the instant. He understood the allusion perfectly. Such parables were common everywhere during those days.

"It is the czar's command," said Nikolai.

"Good," said the general, grinding his teeth. "Very good. My little soldiers are yearning for a taste of blood."

"Your little soldiers will stay within their barracks, and armed sentries will be posted at the gates," retorted Nikolai. "Those cursed English and American newspapers must not be permitted again to say that the czar sets his troops upon his subjects. No, it will be the mob, the mad, uncontrollable mob that will do the shooting. Do you understand?"

"Ah, I will speak to the Russian priests," said Baratoff.

"There again you are in error," said Nikolai. "It must not even be the Russian. His majesty is as gentle-hearted as a child, and it would wound his soul to think that his Russians could commit such atrocities. No; it must be those bloodthristy Roumanians."

"Ah, they are devils, those Roumanians," said the general, winking. "I understand. Five nights hence, at midnight."

"Let the mob assemble, all armed at the north corner of the great square. It is learned that the others are armed. They will assemble on the south side and attack the peaceful inhabitants to glut their savage thirst for blood. Let the Roumanians wait until they see their enemies; then let them open with a fusilade. You understand your instructions?"

"Trust me," the governor answered.

"And, above everything, let no inkling as to this reach the ears of the civil governor. He is in sympathy with the enemy, and his recall is being deliberated in St. Petersburg."

"Good," said the military governor. "He will certainly be recalled when the czar learns of the successful doings of the night. We shall smoke out that brood of cobras—"

"Aye, smoke them out," said Nikolai, with a bitter laugh. "I shall inform his majesty of your discretion. Farewell."

"Your excellency will take a glass of wine with me?" General Baratoff urged.

"I regret that I am unable to. My droschky waits to convey me to the railroad station, for I must leave for St. Petersburg to report to the czar the success of my mission."

And he stalked out, leaving the old general winking and leering in the doorway, a lighted candle in his hand dropping grease all over his dressing-gown.

"And tomorrow my friends must be warned," said Nikolai.

"But," I urged, "if you warn them they will merely barricade their houses or prepare to fly."

"I shall pass the word among the defense committee," Nikolai answered. "They have a corps of three hundred men; they will be prepared."

On the next day Kishineff was ablaze with excitement—a smoulder, I should rather say, for nobody dared to speak openly. Yet the word had already been passed around, for Krushevan's newspaper teemed with dark and cryptic sayings, and special editions were being yelled upon the streets.

"'Let all loyal subjects of the czar keep their houses after nightfall during the next two weeks,'" read Nikolai to me. "'And let them see nothing and hear nothing. And let them keep well away from the great square.'"

And then next day the flight began. The spectacle was pitiful. Men, women, children streamed out of the persecuted quarter toward the railroad station, crowding the compartments of the carriages, herding together; some took oxen wagons across the frontier; some walked. They left their property to the plunder which all anticipated; life was more precious still. But a strong residue remained. And sometimes, from behind barred windows, one saw dark, resolute faces or caught the quick glint of steel.

"The defense committee has been warned," said Nikolai to me. "They will defend themselves. And their leaders have more than inkling as to the true state of affairs."

"And the Rabbi Jacob?" I asked.

"It was thought best to keep him in the dark. He is essentially opposed to violence except in case of self-defense. And yet— is it not self-defense to strike before you are struck?" asked Nikolai, impatiently.

The word had spread throughout the district, he added, and everywhere a nation would rise to free itself, and, in freeing itself, to set free the country.

On the fifth afternoon Kishineff presented a strange appearance. All through the persecuted quarter the doors were bolted and the windows barred. The flight had subsided; all who could depart were gone. The Russian and Roumanian quarters were filled with excited crowds, mostly already drunk, for somebody had handed out free drinks to all who called for them. The tumult of apprehension had given place to a strange, ominous calm; but it was a calm charged with electricity, foreboding a storm.

By evening all our plans had been completed. Nikolai and I repaired to the house of the leader of the committee of defense, who was secreted with a dozen companions in the upper story, the windows being shuttered. All were armed, and it was determined that, as soon as the Roumanians and Russians had fallen upon one another in the public square, the party should burst into the streets, collecting strength as it progressed, and make for the home of Rabbi Jacob. Though he was not in the secret, it was estimated that he would be unable to resist the pressure to put himself at the head of the movement. His presence would kindle a flame of enthusiasm throughout the quarter; an armed force would fall upon the rioters, overcome them, seize guns from the cantonment and depose the governors, afterward proclaiming a republic. With Nikolai at their head, the native element would quickly be brought to alliance and the empire of the czar would fall.

As Nikolai unfolded all his scheme I saw his eyes flash and his nostrils dilate; his breast heaved with pride. I knew that once again he was, in imagination, a great noble whose word was law throughout a province.

The streets were very still. Waiting in silence, we heard the clocks toll out the hours of ten and eleven. The police had been withdrawn; there was nothing to bar the rioters. From our position we could command a view of either side of the great square.

The half-hour struck, and suddenly a murmur rose from the south corner, low and like the humming of bees. Then came the rhythmical tread of men, strangely muical, but growing harsher and heavier as it neared us. And from the north corner came other sounds, but louder and more discordant, for the Roumanians, less furious than the Russians, lacked also their cold stolidity. They were inflamed with vodka and their rage found vent in cries and threats. Their leaders could with difficulty quiet them. The Russians, on the other hand, were silent as savage wolves that wait for the killing.

It was ten minutes before the hour, and now the streets beyond the Russian corner were crowded with a seething mass. I saw the dreadful banners of the Black Hundreds raised through the semi-obscurity. The civil governor had done his work well. Then scouts came slinking through the square, creeping from house to house and from wall to wall. Opposite them, against the white walls of their cathedral, the Roumanians, still disorganized, broke into a tumult of cries. The scouts ran back; somebody fired, and then, with a concerted and spontaneous cry, just as a river bursts its ice barrier in spring, the Russians swept forward to glut their hate in the blood of their supposed enemies.

Leaders were swept aside. They burst across the square, one living, moving crowd, filling it from corner to corner. From the north side the Roumanians heard the challenge; they saw their enemies and were no less mistaken. With a yell they broke upon them. In the middle of the square the forces met.

For an instant I saw the white paving stones between the leading files; then the two bodies dashed against one another as two currents, and just as conflicting streams toss up spray so human bodies, forced forward by those behind them, were hurled into the air somersaulting upon the heads of the fighters. They were too close-packed to fire. They fell upon each other with claws and teeth! the air was filled with an animal-like yelping and the fierce screams of triumph and groans of the stricken. The square had become a moving mass that swayed hither and thither, forced on, drawn back, whirling into eddies that spun and tossed up bodies and opened and closed. Knives gleaned, and suddenly I perceived a line of fire spring up and fringe the combatants. Somebody had thrown the torch that started the conflagration.

The flames spread rapidly from house to house. They flickered on the fierce faces of the combatants. From every street more and more came streaming into the fray and knowing not friend from foe, they fought blindly and insanely till the ground was heaped high with the bodies of the slain.

And then, when at last the Roumanians had given ground, and the Russians poured in upon their quarter with torch and axe, when Kishineff seemed to have fallen upon itself to strike a blow at its own heart, Nikolai gave the signal. We dashed into the streets, running from house to house, and from each recruits of our party came pouring out. At last we were too many to fear any attack, even had the combatants had time to notice us. Nikolai and the committee leader led the way, and we burst into Rabbi Jacob's home, aflame with ardor, maddened with our abortive hopes.

There were sounds of singing from within. And, as we entered the large central room which was used as a place of private worship, our passions died away.

For he was seated upon a kind of dais, surrounded, quite simply, by the women of his family and a few neighbors, all unarmed. Men and women, none seemed to fear. He was chanting a prayer, and they, regardless of us all, joined in the worship.

They neither looked up nor stirred. Afterward I learned that they had mistaken us for rioters, and having laid hopes of life aside, were waiting for death to strike them, fully prepared. But as each man entered, he fell into silence; and presently, one by one, each took up the burden of the song. It rose and fell in the plaintive cadence of a world-old melody, drowning the fierce, distant cries of the murdering Russians now sacking the Roumanian quarter, until its peaceful influence fell upon our hot passions like rain upon a parched field. When that song was concluded, the leader of our band stood forth and very sheepishly, and in stammering accents, made his petition that the rabbi should assume leadership of our movement. The man on the dais listened in silence, often looking from the speaker to Nikolai and back again. When all was silent he spoke, but to Nikolai.

"You are not of our people," he said. "You say you have come here to save us from massacre and to organize a revolution against the czar. For your good will I thank you.

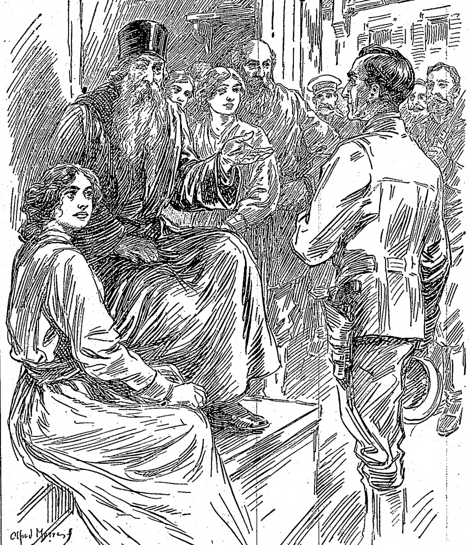
"But we are organized for defense, not for murder or battle. There has been murder enough in Kishineff tonight. Do you think," he continued sternly, "that I would rise from prayer—not for ourselves alone, but for all mankind, for peace and righteousness—to imbue my hands with blood?

"And to you," he went on, addressing himself to his compatriots, "I would say: 'Give up your schemes, fight for your homes, but leave such plots to others.' Aye," he continued to Nikolai, "though you have no ambitions, though your aims are to protect us only, we will have none of them."

He turned to the young leader.

"There are many dead and wounded in the streets tonight," he said. "Send your men to their homes; let their women take blankets and go out to the stricken, tend them and wash their wounds."

I looked at Nikolai, and I perceived that, all unconsciously, the rest had withdrawn from him, so that he stood alone, facing the man on the dais, alone in that assemblage and alone in his designs. He bowed his head upon his breast. His ambition had gone out as one blows out a flame. Slowly he turned and made his way into the street.



"YOU ARE NOT OF OUR PEOPLE," HE SAID.

There Was One Thing.

"Well, I think we have lots to be thankful for," said Mrs. Browning at the breakfast table as she looked over to her better half.

"Humph!" he growled.

"We are not sick."

"Um!"

"Neither of us have died during the year."

"No," he grudgingly replied as he cast a furtive glance at her.

"Your business has been good."

Mr. Browning growled.

"Our house has not burned down."

Another growl.

"We might have been swept over Niagara Falls."

"And we might have been eaten up by cannibals!"

"Jacob Browning, can't you find one single thing to be thankful for on this day?" was demanded.

"I might by looking hard."

"Then you'd better look!"

"Last night when I went to bed," he said, "I had $15 in my pocket."

"And now—this morning?"

"Oh, I'm thankful that you left me a dollar and a half to run the week on!"

Mule's Long Service.

A forty-eight-year-old mule died recently at Springfield, Tenn. The mule was born in 1865 on the farm of Robert Holman, near Springfield. He was named Mike and was broken to work by Holman in 1867 as a two-year-old. As the time rolled on Mike was finally dubbed Old Mike and sold as a "plug" to an old negro, who, with his cart and Old Mike, has been a familiar figure on streets of Springfield for more than thirty years. When Old Mike died he was the oldest mule Tennessee ever produced. Old Mike saw Springfield when it was emerging from a simple village into a town. He saw wooden buildings give way to modern buildings of brick and stone as he plodded his solemn way hauling slop from the backyards of hotels and old boxes and rubbish from the basements of business houses.

First Skyscraper to Go.

Commenting on the fact that the Tower building, located on lower Broadway, the first so-called skyscraper to be erected in New York city, is soon to be razed to make way for a more modern structure, a writer in a recent issue of the Times states: "There is something pathetic as well as distinctly American in the fact that this building, though now only twenty-four years old and illustrating a method of construction that still passes as new, should have been condemned to destruction on the ground that, owing to its antiquity, all its tenants have left it." It is noted that while the structure was but 120 feet high, it was the first to receive the name of "skyschaper" in New York city.

When Frank Tokio Stepped on Hans Olson's Foot

SAN FRANCISCO.—For a long, long while Frank Tokio was a negligible quantity in the trial. This was somewhat strange because he stood in a very prominent place. That is, within a few feet of the witness chair, a point toward which spectators' eyes most frequently focus. It was also strange on account of his striking appearance.

Tokio was not more than four feet tall. His head was large and intellectual looking, with bulging forehead and well rounded dome. He stood with his arms folded, gazing at the witnesses in a pose which suggested to many Napoleon standing on the knoll overlooking the battle of Waterloo.

He was a joint defendant with Hans Olson. He and Olson were charged with disturbing the peace and the arresting officer testified that the two had fought terribly on an Ocean Beach car.

Olson was a giant, towering up so high that it seemed Tokio came only to his knee. Perhaps it was the mighty Olson form which protected the diminutive Tokio from the blast of curious eyes and caught their force in the same way a lightning rod catches the electric current and grounds it harmlessly.

"Yo' say," explained Olson, "das lattle faller he got my goat. Hay ban stap on my foot in car an' walk on my foot an' Ay ban tol' him Ay got corn."

"He grabbed up the little fellow and threw him off the car," testified the policeman. "But he grabbed hold of the big fellow's foot and pulled him off, too. They rolled around on the ground and finally the little chap began to tie up Olson, using his arms and legs as ropes. Olson then grabbed the Japanese by the neck and tossed him up like a football."

"Hay ban prettay strong fallar," said Olson.

"What was all this about anyway?" asked Judge Shortall, gazing keenly at Tokio. "I guess you better call Mr. Gaffeny, the Japanese interpreter," added the judge, speaking to Bailiff Brodt. "I don't suppose this man understands a word of English. What for you too much fight?" asked Judge Shortall again.

Tokio, the midget, stepped up on the dais and leaning confidentially toward the magistrate winked a very significant and intelligent wink. "You know," said he in excellent English, "it was the result of too much sake."

"It was really not his fault at all," continued Tokio. "I have a very dim recollection of swinging some heavy object around my head. I presume it must have been my fine friend here. If I injured him I am sorry. I must have been excited."

"I thoroughly understand, Mr. Tokio," said the judge. "I will have to dismiss the case against Olson on account of your statement. I will have to dismiss the case against you, also, on account of your noble magnanimity."

Why City of Brooklyn Is Famous and Otherwise

NEW YORK.—Brooklyn is a large expanse of territory lying adjacent to New York and on the route to Coney Island. At one time it was a city, but now it is a borough, having been very anxious to sink its identity in that of New York. Brooklyn has regretted it ever since. The borough of Brooklyn is supposed to be the property of the Free and Independent Citizenry of the Municipality of New York, but that is a popular error that is pardonable. In reality Brooklyn is the exclusive poperty of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit company, sometimes called the "B. R. T.," but more often called things that it would be poor taste to repeat here. Exploiting undeveloped territory should be a commendable deed. Men who have opened up virgin lands have been called pioneers. The B. R. T. didn't exactly find Brooklyn an undeveloped territory, but it has been exploiting Brooklyn for many years, nevertheless. Ostensibly the B. R. T. is a corporation organized to run street cars and elevated trains at regular intervals through the streets of Brooklyn. It runs the street cars and trains—also, it runs the Borough of Brooklyn—but it doesn't run the cars at anything resembling regular intervals.

ROUGH NECK
GIT OFF ME FOOT

The Brooklyn bridge has made Brooklyn famous. Lots of people know about the Brooklyn bridge, but they don't know whether it runs from New York to Jersey City or to Staten Island. It does run to Brooklyn. The Brooklyn bridge has tracks for elevated trains and street cars, and every once in a while a street car or an elevated train may be seen crossing it. The bridge has a wide promenade. This is for the benefit of Brooklynites, compelled to alight from an elevated train or street car during a block. Brooklyn bridge has a signal system known to railroad men as a "block system." It is. Every time one of the lamps lights there is a block. The lamps are lighted most of the time. Brooklynites are enthusiastic walkers, especially on snowy days, when the B. R. T. gives vent to an unearthly supernatural groan and just sort of lays down and dies.

New Yorkers visit Brooklyn a great deal, especially in the summer, when they are compelled to pass through it to reach Coney Island and Brighton Beach. This, of course, can't be helped, as the B. R. T. has a monopoly of Coney Island traffic. There is another line running to Coney Island, but nobody ever rides on it, because it affords none of the uncertainty and excitement attached to a trip on the B. R. T. The gambling instinct seems to be natural to Manhattanites. Despite all this it really is reasonably certain that if you get on—IF YOU GET ON—a B. R. T. Coney Island Express, you eventually will arrive at Coney Island. I say IF YOU GET ON, because that is the hardest part of the whole thing, and at the same time the most exciting.

Buys Horse for 15 Cents; Demands Money Back

CHICAGO.—A few days ago John Mayewske, 8612 Baltimore avenue, had a horse, named Algernon. It was twenty-seven years old, blind in one eye, rheumatic, thin and emaciated, but still one could tell from the general shape of its bony structure that it was a horse. On Thursday Mayewske met Tony Novak, 8710 Baltimore avenue.

HE OUGHT TO BE WORT' 15 CENTS ALRIGHT—

"I'll sell you that horse for 15 cents," said John.

"If you are quite sure it's a horse I'll buy it," replied the other.

John went home 15 cents richer and Tony pushed the animal away.

The next day a riot call was turned in at the South Chicago police station and a patrol filled with bluecoats dashed down Baltimore avenue. They found a great crowd of persons gathered about John, Tony and Algernon.

"What's the matter?" asked Patrolman Michael O'Neil, pushing his way into the crowd.

"Matter enough," shouted Tony. "This beast isn't good for anything but to eat. You couldn't even make Algernon go with a motor. I want my 15 cents back."

"I've spent the 15 cents," argued John. "Besides, I've had enough of Algernon."

Finally O'Neil gave Tony 15 cents from his own pocket, and was about to lead the horse away to the pound, when John decided he might be able to sell him to some one else for 15 cents. Algernon went back to his first owner.

GOVERNOR HARRISON'S SILK HAT

© HARRIS & EWING

Former Representative Francis Burton Harrison, the newly appointed governor general of the Philippines, is already known in that part of the world as "the man with the hat," and has been made the object of a good deal of fun. It seems that while on his way to join his post he gave all sorts of elaborate directions, by means of wireless, about his official reception on his arrival at Manila, and emphasized in several of these communications that he would wear for the occasion a cutaway coat, and "a high silk hat," thus indicating that he expected American and native civilian dignitaries to be similarly garbed.

Now high silk hats are virtually unknown in the Philippines, being unsuited for the climate, the usual form of headgear being a pith helmet, such as is worn by white people in the tropics. In fact, the only use made of high silk hats in the Philippines is to present them to petty sultans and chieftains of the remote islands of the archipelago, in lieu of crowns.

The governor general arrived in due course, and landed in his high silk hat, which created a great impression among his compatriots, as well as among the Filipinos. But there were only four hats of this style of architecture visible among the civilian officials and leading American citizens assembled to greet him, and these were of so ancient a vintage that they had the effect of giving a burlesque savor, rather than any solemnity to the occasion.

The American and native newspapers of the Philippine islands are getting no end of amusement out of the new governor general's "topper."

DR. JACOB RIESSER

In the overthrow of the conservative party in Germany at the last elections for the reichstag, two years ago, some saw only a socialist victory. Others who had been studying political and economic conditions in the empire for the few years preceding greeted the result as an anti-agrarian triumph.

In addition to the great number of seats won by the socialists, fifty-eight candidates who were avowedly or known to be agrarians in their sympathies were defeated, not because of the increased popularity of socialist doctrines, but by reason of the spread of revolt against agrarian domination of politics in the empire and the organized campaign against the big landowners and what they stood for, waged for a little more than two years by the Hansa league.

The credit for the defeat of the agrarians is largely due to Prof. Jacob Riesser, the well-known German expert on banking and finance. Dr. Riesser is the founder of the Hansa league, the organization which was formed four years ago to fight agrarianism. Otherwise he is privy councilor of justice, honorary professor in the University of Berlin, and the author of many standard works on banking.

ADMIRAL WATT'S VIEW OF NAVY

© HARRIS & EWING

"Ships we are going to build in the future will have even deeper drafts than thirty feet, and the depth of prominent harbors in the United States should be at least thirty-five feet," said Rear Admiral Watt, chief of the naval bureau of construction and repair, in a statement to the house naval affairs committee.

Admiral Watt was advocating a provision in the naval appropriation bill, which the committee soon will report to the house, to authorize a contract for use by the navy of private dry docks at Hunters point, San Francisco.

Admiral Watt urged that this action was imperative. "With the opening of the Panama canal," he explained, "it is probable that our principal fleet will have periods of duty on the west coast.

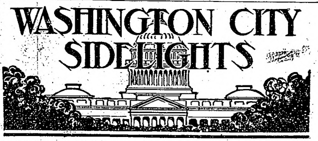
"This provision would permit the docking of the largest ships at Hunters point, instead of sending them to Seattle, 900 miles farther north. We cannot get the battleships to the Mare Island navy yard, and even though the channel were deep enough to send them to the yard, the present docks there would not take ten of the last vessels of the fleet. The battleships contemplated to be sent to the Pacific coast will draw twenty-seven to thirty feet. They can get a ship drawing twenty-four feet up to Mare island at low water, though dredging is being done with a view to deepening it to secure thirty feet."

The admiral also told the committee that there were not enough dry docks for practical purposes on the Atlantic coast.

INTERESTED IN SOCIAL CENTER WORK

Miss Margaret Wilson, daughter of the president, is tremendously interested in the social center movement. She has joined the Monday Evening club of this city and is taking an active interest in the social settlement work in which that club is engaged. Last Monday evening the club held its meeting in the public library, and Miss Wilson was in the audience, but not upon the program. They had under discussion the use of the public school buildings of Washington as the social centers, with United States senators and representatives and several other public men on the regular program. Miss Wilson was not included among the regular speakers, but when the chairman announced that the meeting was open to general discussion Miss Wilson, who was accompanied to the meeting by Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, frankly expressed her sentiments. She said:

"The social center movement in its final analysis is an expression of the spirit of the true democracy. No matter how cultured we are, we cannot get our ideas alone; we have got to get together and get them from each other."



WASHINGTON CITY SIDELIGHTS

Frock Coat Rescued on the Brink of Oblivion

WASHINGTON.—Washington tailors secured an official vindication of the much maligned frock coat at the hands of the fashion committee of the international custom cutters' convention here. This is the supreme court of masculine fashion, and woe to the poor wretch that dares defy its mandates.

GOO' BYE CRUEL WORL'
HEY
OBLIVION
WASH. TAILORS
VERDICT THE FROCK COAT MUST DIE C. C.

All early caucuses of the convention had determined the frock coat must go and that the cutaway was to take its place.

But threats of bolting on the part of the Washington tailors forced the fashion committee to surrender.

Washington claims the distinction of having the greatest per capita total of frock coats outside of Terre Haute—although why Terre Haute should be excepted no one knows. The committee wrote the following vindication into its announcement:

"We wish to emphasize that the double-breasted frock coat is by no means relegated to the background. While the three-button cutaway just at this time is the most popular garment, the frock coat is worn by the highest officials of our nation, and this itself maintains the dignity of this garment."

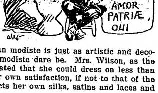
The saving clause, however, was put in, it seems, only for the benefit of frock coats already in existence.

As to the sack coat, the committee condemns narrow shoulders, but insists on a tight waist, and for those who dare it suggests that narrow braid be worn.

Then there are about a thousand words concerning "close contours," "high waist lines," "little dips," "waistcoat exposures," "crescent pocket lines" and a lot of other things that only Jimham Lewis could understand.

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson's Ideas on Dress Making

MRS. WOODROW WILSON, wife of the president, is getting a whole lot of support from women returning from abroad for her ideas of home dress making. It is said by fashionable modistes in Rue de la Paix, Rue Taitbout and Place Vendome that they are practically facing ruin, in that they are not able to keep their styles exclusive. Our American women have been in the habit of going to Paris for their swell society gowns, which they buy as exclusive, and for which they pay a fancy price and high duty. They get them over here, only to find that there are women here who have worn a fac-simile of their gowns for weeks before they get back, and they have about concluded that the American modiste is just as artistic and decorative in their designs as any French modiste dare be. Mrs. Wilson, as the wife of the governor of New Jersey, stated that she could dress on less than $1,000 a year, and she is doing it to her own satisfaction, if not to that of the high-priced foreign modistes. She selects her own silks, satins and laces and has them constructed almost under her own eye, many of her little gowns being made at the White House. A representative of a world-famous dress maker in Rue Taitbout, most of whose customers are Americans, said that unless it should prove possible to copyright not only designs of gowns, but also of trimmings and combinations of colors, he would shortly have to give up his present business and go in for wholesale manufacture.



I AM IN ZEE FACE OF RUIN; ZEE AMERICAN HAF TOO MUCH ZEE WHAT YOU CALL AMOR PATRIÆ, OUI

Thought Roman Numerals Latin for Uncle Sam

THIRD ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY NEWTON is a true-blue American. The figures 1, 2, 3 look better to him than the so-called Roman numerals. He has issued an order that hereafter the date of erection of public buildings shall be put in figures instead of Roman numerals. Secretary Newton says:

MCXVI A.D.
THAT MUST BE THE TRADE MARK TH' CONTRACTOR PUTS ON

"Even persons of average education, being unaccustomed to the Roman numerals frequently find considerable difficulty in determining from the lettering on the public building just when it was erected. To many the Roman numerals mean no more than do the emblems of the Masonic Order to a person outside of that Order. So infrequently are the Roman characters now used that many persons of intelligence in this country believe that the customary date on public buildings are marks placed there by the engineers.

"The misinformation in this matter was recently illustrated when a party of tourists stood gazing at one of the show buildings in Washington. One man in the party, pointing to the Roman numerals high up over the door, said:

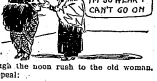
"'What the deuce does that MCXVI business mean up there?'

"'What,' said another, 'don't you know? That's a mark the contractor puts on. It's his trademark.'

"'You're wrong, there, Bill,' exclaimed a third member of the party. 'That's a sign put there by the government. It's Latin for Uncle Sam.'"

Keeping Tab on Things That Are Worth Studying

"I DON'T like to ask you, but will you please give me change for a cup of tea? I haven't any money with me, and I'm so weak I can't go on." The woman who asked might have stepped out of dear old grandmother's chair by the chimney corner. Except that there are no chimney corners these days, and precious few old grandmothers.



PLEASE GIVE ME CHANGE FOR A CUP OF TEA — I'M SO WEAK I CAN'T GO ON

The woman who responded was just a so-so person who hurried on. And then felt ashamed of herself for not taking the little old dame into a cafe and seeing her safe home. You have to do a thing like that once in awhile to feel that you were worth the Lord's creating. So she turned back to atone and had almost elbowed her way through the noon rush to the old woman, when again she heard the quavering appeal:

"I don't like to ask you, but will you please give me change for a cup of tea? I haven't any money with me, and I'm so weak I can't go on."

As a thing like that is worth studying, the so-so woman stood by, and kept tab. After eight women and an earth-earthy young man had paid tribute, the old woman rested up long enough to turn around. Then she suddenly made for the corner. Obviously, she didn't like the appearance of the woman who was looking on. Some don't.

Begging is against the law, of course, but what are you going to do when an aged lady strikes you for a cup of tea? Remembering that cup of cold water?

SEVERAL DEAD, MANY HURT, IN BIG STORM

NORTHEASTERN STATES SUFFER WORST CONDITIONS OF YEARS.

NEW YORK ALMOST ISOLATED

Most Outside Telegraph Wires Go Down—13,000 Men Needed to Clear Away Snow—Ships in Danger.

New York, March 3.—Three deaths, scores overcome by exposure, and as many injured in various accidents, was the record in this city of the storm which struck the northeastern states early Sunday. Trains have all been late, and the city is almost cut off from wire communication with the outside world.

14,000 Snow Shovelers.

Between 13,000 and 14,000 snow shovelers were needed today, and the force of the unemployed is temporarily reduced by that number. The telegraph companies say the conditions are the worst in years.

The Western Union's 50 wires to Chicago and most of the 151 wires to Philadelphia were down. The Postal reported wire prostration of equal seriousness.

Week to Repair Service.

It will be nearly a week, it is said, before the service can be wholly restored.

Ships due to reach here were held up outside of Sandy Hook. On advices from Washington, the local bureau warned shipping not to put out to sea.

The west-bound Twentieth Century limited was reported halted by fallen poles across the tracks at Ossinning.

Roof Collapses, Killing Two.

The roof over a sidewalk here collapsed under the weight of wet snow, crushing a man and a boy. Another man, blinded by snow, was killed by a train. Several persons were overcome by exposure, and many were injured. The gale at times reached a velocity of 72 mils an hour.

In neighboring towns there were five deaths due to the storm. The safety of the crew of an unknown schooner aground off the Connecticut shore was in doubt.

In New Jersey, Hoboken, Passaic, New Brunswick, Jersey City and other communities were thrown into darkness at nightfall, the authorities in several instances discontinuing the electric light service because of fallen wires.

BEACHEY, INTREPID AVIATOR, NARROWLY ESCAPES DEATH

Loses Control of Biplane While "Looping the Loop" and Falls 1,600 Feet.

Santa Barbara, Cal., March 3.—While "looping the loop" here, Lincoln Beachey, the aviator, lost control of his biplane and fell 1,600 feet, but managed to right himself 400 feet from the ground and escaped with slight injuries. His machine crashed into a tree and snapped the trunk, but was not much impaired. The aviator was at a height of 2,000 feet when he made his loop. His biplane then pointed its nose toward the earth and made a spiral dip. Beachey had lost control. For 100 feet or more, the biplane fell sideways, completing a circle in that position, then floundered, dipped upwards and came down slanting at an angle, with the engine working perfectly all the time.

Former Grand Vizier Dies.

Constantinople, March 3. — Said Pasba, former grand vizier, is dead here.

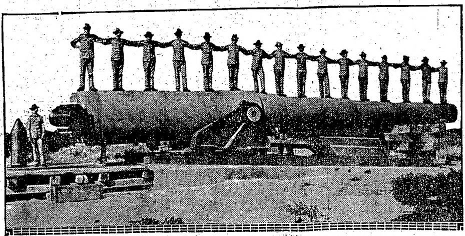
Bible 650 years old burned.

Joliet, Ill., March 3.—Relics worth $7,000, including a Bible more than 650 years old, were destroyed by fire which burned to the ground the residence of Mrs. G. L. Vance, wife of a collector.

Alfonso Receives Fair Envoys.

Madrid, March 3.—The commissioners of the Panama-Pacific exposition were granted an audience by King Alfonso, who greeted them cordially. The commissioners then departed for Toledo.

WORLD'S BIGGEST GUN FOR PANAMA CANAL



This, the largest gun in the world, has been made to defend the Pacific entrance to the Panama canal. It has a 16-inch bore, weighs 130 tons and throws a projectile weighing 2,400 pounds. The weapon will be mounted on a disappearing carriage on one of the small islands off the mouth of the canal.

GRAY TO HEAD MARYLAND R. R.

PRESIDENT OF GREAT NORTHERN ACCEPTS NEW POST.

Southern Coal Line, With 543 Miles of Track, Selects Westerner.

New York, Mar. 2.—The mystery about Carl R. Gray, president of the Great Northern railroad, is solved. His new title will soon be that of president and chairman of the board of the Western Maryland Railway company, with headquarters in Baltimore.

This is a southern coal road, which last year operated 543 miles of road and which runs from Baltimore to Connellsville. When it was reorganized in 1909, John D. Rockefeller proved to be by far the largest stockholder. He, like the smaller fellows, paid the assessment of $40 a share levied by the reorganization committee. B. F. Bush, now president of the Missouri Pacific, and several other Gould roads, was the first president after the reorganization. He was succeeded by Alexander Robertson, who was vice president, and who is now assistant to Mr. Burt on the Missouri Pacific. J. M. Fitzgerald followed Robertson.

At Connellsville, its western terminus, the Western Maryland connects with the Pittsburg & Lake Erie, one of the New York Central lines. After the agreement was made it was found that the Western Maryland did not have the facilities to handle the through business. Serious congestion followed, but that situation is pretty well cleared up now.

It was announced at the offices of the Western Maryland Railway company, after a long meeting of the directors, that Mr. Gray had accepted the presidency of the company, which had been offered to him. He expects, within the next ten days, to assume the duties of that office, as well as those of the chairmanship of the board. This is conditioned upon the acceptance by the Great Northern Railway company of his resignation, which will now be presented for that purpose.

Mr. Fitzgerald, who was elected to the presidency of the Western Maryland about a year ago in an emergency of the company's administration at that time, has presented his resignation, to become effective when Mr. Gray reports for the assumption of his new duties in Baltimore.

GIRL 'CLOSES' ANOTHER TOWN

Miss Hobbs, Private Secretary of Oregon Executive, Wins Again in Decision of Cove.

Salem, Ore., Mar. 2.—Miss Fern Hobbs, private secretary to Governor Oswald West, won another victory for Oregon prohibition forces, when word was received from County Judge Henry that the Union county court would meet March 4 and declare the town of Cove "dry."

When a recent local option election was held in Union county, Cove voted "dry," although the county majority nullified the precinct vote at Cove. Governor West recently sent his private secretary to investigate conditions at Cove. Miss Hobbs previously was instrumental in closing the saloons at Copperfield.

Wisconsin Defrauder Sentenced.

Winnipeg, Feb. 27.—Alex Lotoski, recently arrested at Grand Rapids, Wis., on a charge of defrauding numerous persons of this province out of hundreds of dollars while posing as a steamship agent, was sentenced to two years in the penitentiary. It is also said that he was wanted in New York on a warrant charging him with fraud.

Plans Trans-Atlantic Flight.

Paris, Feb. 28. — Alexander Dumas, an engineer, laid before the French Aerial Navigation society, presided over by Prince Boland Bonaparte, the result of his studies of the problem of a trans-Atlantic aeroplane flight. Under the plan of M. Dumas the trip would take 62 hours, exclusive of stops, of which there would be two—the Azores islands and New Foundland—for fuel and provisions. The machine advocated by M. Dumas would be a huge triplane, having an average speed of about 51 miles.

DISCOVER EVIDENCE FOR BECKER TRIAL

SCHEPPS HELD OPEN DOOR OF "MURDER CAR" DURING SHOOTING.

WILL DISPROVE ALLEGATIONS

Attorney for Former Lieutenant Asserts Witnesses Can Prove That Conferences Did Not Take Place.

New York, Mar. 2.—Sam Schepps held open the door of the "murder car" while gunmen shot down Herman Rosenthal, the gambler, is part of the newly discovered evidence that will be presented at the second trial of Charles Becker, according to a statement made by Joseph A. Shay, attorney for the former police lieutenant.

Schepps, it is said by Mr. Shay, stood on the running board of the automobile while it was waiting across the street from the Hotel Metropole, where the murder occurred. Mr. Shay would not say definitely whether he hoped to prove that Schepps rode off in it.

Becker's attorney also plans to have witnesses testify that several meetings spoken of by Schepps, Harry Vallon and Jack Rose in their testimony at the trial and at which Becker was said to have made the arrangements for the killing, did not take place.

Witnesses would be produced, Mr. Shay said, who would testify that Becker was in a different part of the city at the time of the alleged conference.

"Lefty Louie" Denies Rumor.

Ossining, N. Y.—"Lefty" Louis Rosenberg, one of the four gunmen who will die in the electric chair April 13, for the part they have played in the murder of Herman Rosenthal, the gambler, made a statement through his attorney, in which he denied that he and his companions would try to throw the entire blame for the killing upon Charles Becker, as had been reported.

UNION MEN CONDEMN MILITIA

Assert National Guard Always Lines Up Against Labor—$10,000 for Strikers.

Peoria, Ill., Mar. 2.—The Illinois division of the United Mine Workers of America adopted a resolution condemning the national guard and urging all local unions to do everything in their power to keep their members from affiliating with the various companies throughout the state and nation.

The text of the resolution recites that in every industrial struggle the national guard has been found lined up against union labor, and all labor organizations are asked to do all they can against the national guard in an effort to defeat its purposes. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 200 to 10.

After a hard fight on the floor of the convention, it was decided to donate $10,000 to aid the striking miners in the Michigan copper district.

Taft Lunches With Wilsons.

Washington Mar. 2.—The president and Mrs. Wilson had as their luncheon guests former President Taft, Senator Root of New York and Miss Mabel Boardman, director of the American Red Cross. It was the second time the former president had taken lunch with President Wilson since last March.

Promises Severe Punishment.

Mexico City, Mar. 2. — Jose Lopex Portillo Y Rojas, minister of foreign affairs, replying to representations made to him by Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the American charge d'affaires, regarding the killing of Clemente Vergara by Federals near Hidalgo, said that severe and swift punishment would be administered in case the guilt of any person or persons was established. The minister said the government had received no report of the incident officially.

AUTO THIEVES IN SYNDICATE

NATION-WIDE BAND OF SUCH ROBBERS REVEALED.

Confession Made to Police of New York—Year's Booty Said to Have Reached Half Million.

New York, Mar. 2.—The existence of a country-wide syndicate of automobile thieves and "fences" with headquarters in New York, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia and New Orleans, was revealed in a confession made to Judge Swann and Assistant District Attorney Deuel by Charles Rudy, 24 years old, a chauffeur.

Rudy admitted he had made thousands of dollars in the last year as the director of a gang of automobile thieves and receiver of the machines they stole. His story resulted in the arrest of Frederick F. Goodman, a dealer in autos, and Felix Leopold.

Many of the cars stolen in New York were traced to Goodman, Mr. Deuel said. Goodman and Leopold are charged with criminally receiving a car stolen from John P. Agnew in New Jersey and selling it to a real estate dealer in Brooklyn. Judge Wadhams fixed Goodman's bail at $7,500 and Leopold's at $2,000.

An important part of Rudy's confession deals with his relations to automobile insurance companies. He places part of the responsibility for the numerous thefts on them by the assertion that he had a tacit understanding with two insurance adjusters under the terms of which they would buy back all the insured automobiles he stole, "and no questions asked."

It was the uninsured cars and those which could be sold for more than the insurance companies would pay which were dealt in by the national syndicate.

Rudy says that the insurance companies were usually ready to pay from $200 to $400 for a car. If it would bring more than that he says it was turned over to the syndicate. There it was changed in appearance as much as possible and sent to one of the Philadelphia, Chicago or New Orleans branches in exchange for another car.

Figures given to Judge Swann show that 258 automobiles valued at about $500,000 were stolen by the gang in the year 1912. Of these 188 were sold to the insurance companies. Ninety per cent of the rest were shipped to other cities in exchange for cars sold in New York.

FUND DOUBLED WHEN FOUND

Chicago Exposition Souvenir Profits Available for the Betterment of Women and Children.

Chicago, Mar. 2.—The whereabouts of funds derived from the sale of souvenirs during the world's fair in 1893, about which there has been much speculation here, has been definitely established by Mrs. Potter Palmer, president of the board of women managers of the World's Columbian exposition.

The money, which amounted to $36,000 at the end of the fair, was invested in securities and placed in a safe deposit vault here. The fund has grown through interest until it amounts to $67,500.11. This fund is available at any time, Mrs. Palmer said, to be consolidated with funds from the sale of Isabella coins and to be used in the work for which it was raised—the permanent betterment of women and children.

Wind Damage in Alberta.

Claresholm, Alta., Mar. 2.—A windstorm that assumed cyclonic proportions swept over this town, wrecking buildings, breaking plate glass windows and tearing street signs from their fastenings. No deaths were reported.

Federals Strengthening Position.

Chihuahua, Mex., Feb. 28.—As an explanation of his continued delay in attacking the federal army at Torreon, 300 miles south of here, opinions were expressed freely by close advisers of General Francisco Villa that the rebel leader is content with his present supreme authority and that he will not push southward until necessity seems to require it. Meantime the federal army is believed to have been constantly strengthening its defenses and fortifying the railroads south and east

ENGLAND AND U. S. PROBING DEATHS

BOTH MEXICAN FACTIONS MUST EXPLAIN ALLEGED OUTRAGES TO FOREIGNERS.

TO EXAMINE BENTON'S BODY

Committee Goes to Chihuahua For That Purpose—Reported Vergara Was Shot By Federals, Not Hanged.

BULLETIN.

Juarez.—The Benton investigating commission has been prevented from proceeding to Chihuahua to examine the slain Briton's body by rebel orders. Colonel Fidel Avila, military commander here, declined to permit them to board the regular passenger train, which was waiting.

Washington—The refusal of the Mexican constitutionalist authorities at Juarez to permit the Benton commission to enter Mexico, involved the Mexican situation in a still more hopless tangle. Carranza, the head of the constitutionalist movement, has intimated that Great Britain must deal directly with him in the Benton controversy, while Sir Lionel Carden, the British minister to Mexico, declares positively that his government could not go thus far toward a recognition of the Carranza faction.

Washington, Mar. 2.—Officials here discussed with much interest the report of Captain Sanders, of the Texas Rangers, saying Clemente Vergara, an American citizen reported hanged, really had been kidnaped and shot by Huerta's federals.

Little Official Information.

While Consul Garrett had been ordered to make an extended inquiry, and vigorous representations demanding reparation have been made to the Huerta government at Mexico City, there was little official information on the Vergara killing, which admittedly has stirred the Washington government just as much as the recent execution of William S. Benton, a British subject, at Juarez.

The inquiry into the Benton case was planned to begin in earnest with the arrival of a special train from Juarez at Chihuahua, bearing representatives of England and the United States.

Opinion is divided here on whether Benton's body, after being buried nearly two weeks in a tropical climate, would show whether his wounds were inflicted by a pistol or a firing squad. While no satisfactory answer has been made to the American government's request for surrender of the body to the widow, that point will not be pressed until all the evidence of a medical examination is obtained.

The constitutionalists leaders in northern Mexico are willing to pay money damages for the death of Benton. While defending Villa's action in executing the British rancher, word reached here unofficially that Carranza and his chief advisers would willingly compensate the widow should England indicate that such action would aid in closing the incident. But it is said from British sources unless it is found Villa's original story of self-defense or courtmartial verdict is true, a monetary recompense will not be considered. Villa is held responsible by Great Britain for Benton's death and the burden of proof is on him, the embassy here holds, to show that the killing was justifiable.

Having taken this position, England will make no further move until after the investigation now in progress is concluded.

FRENCH COAL STRIKE ENDED

Strike of 40,000 Miners Who Walked Out Feb. 24 to Return to Their Work.

Paris, March 2.—At a meeting of the National Council of Miners' unions it was decided to call off the strike of coal miners begun in the southern coal fields Feb. 24.

The national council requested the various organizations to have their men resume work. The strike was called as a protest against the elimination by the senate of some clauses of the underground workers' pension bill. Forty thousand men struck.

Plane Falls; Two Killed.

Lyons, France, March 2. — Pierre and Gabriel Salvez, brothers, were killed while making an experimental flight in an all-metal monoplane of their own invention, when the left wing of the craft collapsed.

Would Stop Car Smoking.

Chicago, Mar. 2. — Smoking on street cars will be abolished if an ordinance recommended by the health commission is adopted by the city council. The proposed law carries a penalty of from $1 to $10.

Sylvia Still Eludes Police.

London, Mar. 2.—Dr. Ethel Smith and several other suffragettes were arrested following a meeting which was addressed by Sylvia Pankhurst, who stood in the window of a house in which she is eluding arrest.

QUICKLY STOPS THE WORST BACKACHE

Croxone Makes Kidney Troubles, Bladder Disorders, Rheumatic Pains Vanish.

If you suffer with backaching kidney trouble, have disagreeable bladder and urinary disorders, or are tortured with rheumatism, stiff joints, and its heart-wrenching pains, you will be surprised how quickly and surely Croxone will relieve all such troubles.

It soaks right in through the walls, membranes and linings, neutralizes, dissolves and makes the kidneys sift out and filter away the uric acid and poisons from the blood, and leaves the kidneys and urinary organs clean, strong, healthy and well.

It matters not how long you have suffered, how old you are, or what you have used, it is practically impossible to take Croxone without results. It starts to work the minute you take it and is guaranteed to relieve you the first time you use it, or cost you nothing.

If you suffer with pains in your back and sides, or have any signs of kidney, bladder trouble, or rheumatism, such as puffy swellings under the eyes or in the feet and ankles, if you are nervous, tired and run down, or bothered with urinary disorders, Croxone really will relieve your misery and do it quickly. An original package costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if it fails in a single case.—Adv.

OR AT LEAST NOT WORKING

Smith's Machine Had the Horse Power All Right, but He Thought Some Were Dead.

They were talking automobile reminiscences and Congressman Jacob Johnson of Utah recalled the experience of Smith along a country road.

The inexplicable thing had happened some ten miles from a garage, and Smith was mauling over the machine with a monkey wrench, when a farmer came along.

For a while Hiram stood in silence watching the efforts of the autoist, and then human nature asserted itself and he broke into conversation.

"Some car ye've got there, pard," he remarked, admiringly. "What power is it?"

"Forty horse power," answered Smith, continuing to plug away with the monkey wrench.

"Forty hoss, eh?" returned Hiram, still working his eyes. "What seems ter be the trouble with it?"

"Well, as near as I can figure it out," answered Smith, with a sort of cross between a sigh and a cuss, "about 39 of the horses are dead."

Napoleon's Vain Struggle.

One hundred years ago the Emperor Napoleon, after having fought three battles with the allies in three successive days, met Blucher himself at Vauchamps, and, after a keenly fought engagement, drove the invaders back with considerable loss. By the four engagements with the Silesian army, fought between February 10 and February 14, Napoleon gained 18,060 prisoners, whom he at once sent to Paris in order to raise the depressed spirits of the populace. In that, however, he only succeeded imperfectly, for while Blucher was temporarily held in check Prince Schwartzenberg advanced up the Seine toward Paris, and the Russians under the Emperor Alexander were likewise pressing steadily forward with the French capital as their objective.

Discreet Idealism.

"Wouldn't you rather be right than be president?"

"Yes," replied the busy stateman; "if I'm dead sure there's no chance of my being president."

NO GUSHER

But Tells Facts About Postum.

A Wis. lady found an easy and safe way out of the ills caused by coffee. She says:

"We quit coffee and have used Postum for the past eight years, and drink it nearly every meal. We never tire of it.

"For several years previous to quitting coffee I could scarcely eat anything on account of dyspepsia, bloating after meals, palpitation, sick headache—in fact was in such misery and distress I tried living on hot water and toast.

"Hearing of Postum I began drinking it and found it delicious. My ailments disappeared, and now I can eat anything I want without trouble.

"My parents and husband had about the same experience. Mother would often suffer after eating, while yet drinking coffee. My husband was a great coffee drinker and suffered from indigestion and headache.

"After he stopped coffee and began Postum both ailments left him. He will not drink anything else now and we have it three times a day. I could write more but am no gusher—only state plain facts."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The boy becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis' son while the former goes to America. The Marquis asks Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her lackeys. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill, in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis' brother Francois lures the Austrians from the hotel allowing the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years, in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants, and through him sends word to his friends of his plight. The general, Alixe and Pietro plans Francois' escape. Francois receives a note from Pietro explaining in detail how to escape from his prison. Alixe awaits him on horseback and leads him to his friends on board the American sailing vessel, the "Lovely Lucy." Francois, as a guest of Harry Hampton, on the "Lovely Lucy," goes to America to manage Pietro's estate in Virginia. Lucy Hampton falls in love with Francois.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Continued.

The female mind paid no attention to the disgression. Lucy had long ago, finally if unconsciously, put her father's personality into its right place.

"Father, is the prince really poor and alone in this country?"

"Poor—yes, I fancy—I am quite certain, in fact. Alone—that depends. The authorities of Norfolk received him with some distinction, the Herald states, but he is putting up at the inn—one would conclude that he was an invited guest at many of our great houses."

Lucy flew like a bird across to the fireplace. Her hands went up to either side of the colonel's face. "Father, quick! Have Thunder saddled, and ride in—quick, father—and bring the prince out here to stay with us. Give the order to Sambo, or I shall."

Colonel Hampton's eyes widened with surprise. "Why, but Lucy," he stammered. "Why—but why should I? What claim have we—"

"Oh, nonsense," and Lucy shook her head impatiently. "Who has more claim? Aren't we Virginians of the James river princes in our own country, too? Hasn't our family reigned in Roanoke longer than ever his reigned in Europe? Haven't we enough house room and servants to make him as comfortable as in a palace? But that isn't the most important. It is a shame to us all, father, that no one has invited him before, that a strange gentleman of high station should have to lodge at an inn. Why hasn't Cousin George Harrison asked him to Brandon? And the Carters at Shirley, and the people at Berkeley—what do they mean by not asking him? But we won't let Virginian hospitality be stained. We will ask him. You will ride to Norfolk at once, will you not, father dear?"

The touch on his cheek was pleasant to the vain and affectionate man, but the spirit of the girl's speech, the suggestion of the courtesy due from him as a reigning prince, to this other prince forlorn and exiled, this was pleasanter. He pursued his lips and smiled down.

"Out of the mouth of babes," he remarked, and drew his brows together as if under stress of large machinery behind them. "My little girl, you have rather a sensible idea. I had overlooked before, that"—he cleared his throat and black Aaron standing tray in hand across the room, jumped and rolled his eyes—"that," he continued, "a man of my importance has duties of hospitality, even to a foreigner who comes without introduction into the country."

"Aaron, tell Sambo to saddle Thunder," he ordered.

* * * * * *

Prince Louis, in his dingy parlor at the inn, looked at his visitor from between half-shut eyelids, and measured him, soul and body. He considered the invitation for a silent moment. This was one of the great men of the country. The prince had already heard his name and the name of his historic home. It was well to have influential friends, more particularly as no letter awaited him as he had hoped from his uncle, Joseph Bonaparte, with the American introductions for which he had asked. A visit of a few days at this place of Roanoke could do no harm and might lead to good.

"I thank you very much, Monsieur le Colonel," he said gravely, yet graciously. "You are most good to desire that I visit you. I will do so with pleasure."

Out they rode through the sunlighted, wind-whipped country, dozing restfully through its last winter's nap, stirring already at the step of lively April on the threshold. The air was sharp, and nipped at the prince's fingers and toes, but it was exhilaration to be across a horse again, and the exile's spirit—the case-hardened heart of steel which failure and misfortune never broke till it broke forever at Sedan—grew buoyant. That "something about the outside of a horse which is good for the inside of a man" worked its subtle charm on this finished horseman and horse lover, and he was gently responsive as the colonel talked fluently on.

"Does it so happen, Monsieur le Colonel, that there is in these parts a Frenchman of—of instruction—a man whom I might use as a secretary? I shall have need tomorrow to write letters. Would you know of such a man, Monsieur le Colonel?"

Nothing pleased Monsieur le Colonel more than to be master of the situation. "Most certainly,' he answered blandly and felt that the prince must notice how no demand could find Colonel Hampton at a loss. "Most certainly. My daughter's French master would be the very fellow. He is intelligent and well educated, and what is more, he is a most ardent adherent of your family, prince. He has talked to Miss Hampton with such a vehement enthusiasm that, by the Lord Harry, I believe she expects to see you fly in with wings, sir—I believe she does," and the colonel laughed loudly and heartily. It was as good a joke as he had ever made.

And before them, at that moment, rose a stately picture. A large old house, built of dark red brick brought from England, towered suddenly from out of the bare trees of its park like a monument of calm hospitality. Its steep roof was set with dormer windows; its copings and its casements were white stone; a white stone terrace stretched before it. At one front, as they came, was the carriage entrance, and the squares of a formal English garden, walled with box hedges, lay sleeping before the springtime; at the opposite side a wide lawn fell to a massive brick wall, spaced with stone pillars, guarding the grounds from the flowing of the James river. Colonel Hampton gazed at the home of his people and then at his guest, and he cast the harness of his smallnesses and stood out in the simple and large cordiality which is the heritage above others of southern people.

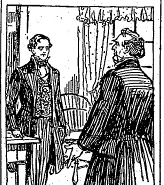
"Your are welcome to Roanoke, prince," he said.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Brothers.

Colonel Hampton's study was dark from floor to ceiling with brown oak wainscoting and was lightened by a dull brightness of portraits. An ancestor in a scarlet coat, the red turned yellow and brown with time; an ancestress in dimmed glory of blue satin and lace and pearls; a judge in his wig and gown, gave the small room importance. A broad window looked through bare branches, lacy-black against sky, across a rolling country and groups of woodland.

On the morning of the first day of April, 1837, Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte stood at this window, staring at brown fields and trying to trace a likeness between this new world and the ancient country which he called his; France, where, since he was seven years old, he had been allowed to spend but a few weeks; France, which had freshly exiled him; France, the thought of which ruled him, as he meant one day to rule her; France, for whom he was eating his heart out today, as always, thousands of miles from her shores.



He Considered the Invitation for a Silent Moment.

He recalled the happy life at Arenenberg, in Switzerland, and the work and play and soldierly training which all pointed, in the boy's mind, to one end—to serve France—a service which did not at that time mean sovereignty, for the Duke of Reichstadt, Napoleon's son, was alive and the head of the house of Bonaparte. He thought of his short career, his and his well-beloved brother's together, with the Italian insurgents against the Austrians, and the lonely man's heart longed for his own people as he went over again that time of excitement and sorrow, ending with the older boy's death at Forli and his own illness and narrow escape from capture.

"What a mother!" he cried aloud, tossing up his hands with French demonstrativeness, as the memory came to him of the days in Ancona when he lay at death's door, hidden in the very room next that of the Austrian general, saved only at last by the marvelous mother's wit and courage. The journey through Italy to France, that was drama enough for one life. Recognized at every turn, betrayed never, and ending with—Prince Louis smiled his slow dim smile—a fitting ending indeed to days whose every minute was adventure. He thought of the landlord of the inn, the old cavalryman; the young Frenchman—Beaupre—that was the name; it was set in his memory; had been in that tenacious memory since an afternoon of 1824, when a runaway schoolboy prince had slipped over the Jura, and played with three other children, about a ruined castle; he saw Francois Beaupre take reverently in his hand the sword which Napoleon had held—and then the alarm! That was a fine sight—the dash of the youngster through the startled mob of Austrians; the flying leap to the horse; the skirmish to get free, and, at last, the rush of the chase. He had seen it all, watching quietly while his mother and the landlord implored him to hide himself. That young Frenchman—if he should be alive—if ever he should meet him again Prince Louis would not forget. It was psychological that he should have been thinking this when a knock sounded deferentially on the door of the room. But picturesque coincidences happen in lives as well as on the stage; in Louis Napoleon's there was more than one. "Entrez!" he called sharply, and then, "Come in!"

The door swung slowly and Aaron, white-aproned and white-eyeballed, stood in it.

"Marse Prince," he stated with a dignity of service which crowned heads could not daunt, "ole Marse sen' me bring you dis hyer Marse Bopray."

A light figure stepped before the black and white of Aaron, and halted, and bowed profoundly. The light from the window shone on his face and the dark immense eyes that lifted toward Prince Louis, and for a moment he stared, puzzled. Was he in the present? Surely this man was part of the past which he had been reviewing. Surely he had played a role in the prince's history—where? With a flashing thought into the years he knew.

"Mon ami!" cried Louis Bonaparte, and sprang forward and stretched out both hands, his royalty forgotten in the delight of seeing a face which recalled his youth and his mother.

Francois, two minutes later, found himself standing, bursting with loyalty and pride, with the prince's hands clasping his, and the prince's transformed face beaming on him.

"You rode like the devil," said the prince. "But the Austrians had the horses. That poor Bleu-bleu! How did you get away? Where have you been? Mon Dieu, but we looked for you, Zappi and I!"

"But no, your highness, I did not get away," smiled Francois Beaupre as if imparting a joyful bit of news. "They caught me."

And he told briefly his story of the five years in prison, of the desperate escape, of the rescue and voyage to America, of his wrecked health, not yet re-established. Through the account shone the unconquerable French gaiety. Another thing there was which a Frenchman and a Bonaparte could not fail to see—that the thought of his service to the house of Bonaparte had been a sustaining pride, and the hope of future service an inspiring hope.

Superstition and gratitude laid hold together on the prince's troubled mind. He threw himself back into Colonel Hampton's leather arm-chair, throne-like in impressiveness and size; the mask of impassivity closed on his colorless featues.

"Sit there, Monsieur," he ordered, "and tell me your life."

Simply, yet dramatically as was his gift, the young man went over the tale which he had told to Lucy Hampton, that and more. And the prince listened to every word. He, too, had the French sensitiveness to theatrical effect, and his over-wrought imagination seemed to see the hand of destiny visibly joining this story to his. Here was a legacy from Napoleon; an instrument created by his uncle, which he, the heir, should use. There was a long silence when Francois had finished, and Louis' deep-pitched voice broke it.

"'One day perhaps a marshal of France under another Bonaparte,'" he repeated thoughtfully. "It was the accolade, the old right of royalty," and gazed, if reflecting, at the other man's face.

Heightened color told how much it meant to Francois Beaupre to hear those words spoken by the prince.

"My prince, I will tell you—though it may be of little moment to know—that it is not for my own advancement that I care. It is the truth that I would throw away a hundred lives if I had them, to see the house of Bonaparte rule France. It is only so, I believe, that France can become great once more. We need heroes to lead us, we Frenchmen, not shopkeeper kings such as Louis Phillippe; if it has not a hero the nation loses courage, and its interest in national life. But the very name of Napoleon is inspiration—it pricks the blood; a monarch of that name on France's throne, and our country will wake, will live. You, my prince, are the hope of the house of Napoleon."

With a quick step forward he threw himself on his knees before the quiet figure in the throne-like chair; he seized the prince's hand and, head bent, kissed it with passion. There was a line of color in each cheek as his face lifted, and his brilliant look was shot with a tear.

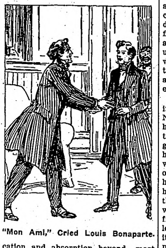
"If I may die believing that I have helped to win your throne, I shall die in happiness."

Prince Louis had his mother's warm heart, and this went to it. He put his hand on the other's shoulder, familiarly as if the two were equals, kinsmen.

The brotherly touch on Francois' shoulder was withdrawn, and with gentle dignity, with a glance, the prince lifted him to his feet, and Francois stood happy, dazed, before him. He found himself telling his plans, his methods, his efforts to fit himself for the usefulness that might be on the way.

"I have studied enormously, my prince. All known books on warlike subjects, all I could borrow or steal I have studied. Ah, yes! I know much of these things."

Louis Bonaparte, with an exhaustive military education, a power of application and absorption beyond most men in Europe, let the gleam of a smile escape. He listened with close attention while Francois told of his organization of the youth of the neighborhood into a cavalry company, and of their drill twice a week.



"Mon Ami," Cried Louis Bonaparte.

"And you are the captain, Monsieur?"

Francois smiled a crafty, worldly-wise smile—or perhaps it was as if a child would seem crafty and worldly-wise. "No, my prince," he answered, shaking his head sagely. "That would not be best. I am little known, a foreigner. They think much of their old families, the people of these parts. So that it is better for the success of the company that the captain should be of the nobility of the country. One sees that. So the captain of the company is Monsieur Henry Hampton, the younger, the kinsman of Monsieur le Colonel, and a young man of great goodness, and the best of friends to me. Everything that I can do for his pleasure is my own pleasure."

The prince turned his expressionless gaze on the animated face. "Mademoiselle Lucy likes the young monsieur?"

"But yes, my prince—she likes every one, Mademoiselle Lucy. It is sunshine, her kindness; it falls everywhere and blesses where it falls. She loves Henry—as a brother."

"As a brother!" the prince repeated consideringly. "Yes, a brother. You find Mademoiselle Lucy of—of a kind disposition."

"Beyond words, and most charming," Francois answered steadily, and flushed a little. He felt himself being probed. With that the facile, mysterious, keen mind of the prince leaped, it seemed, a world-wide chasm. "That most winning little girl of the ruined chateau of Vicques—our playmate Alixe—you remember how she stated, 'I am Alixe,' and was at once shipwrecked with embarrassment?"

"I remember," Francois said shortly, and was conscious that he breathed quickly and that his throat was dry, and that the prince knew of both troubles.

"Is she still 'Alixe'—the same Alixe?" inquired the prince, turning ostentatiously to the window. "Has she grown up as sweet and fresh and brilliant a flower as the rosebud promised?"

Francois, hearing his own heart beat, attempted to answer in a particularly casual manner, which is a difficult and sophisticated trick. He failed at it. "They say—I think—she has—oh, but yes, and—I think"—he stammered and the prince cut short his sufferings. "Ah, yes! I see that it is with you, as with Monsieur Henry, a case of devoted brotherhood. You love her as a brother—you will not boast of her.

"You have done well, Chevalier Beaupre. You have done so well that when the time is ripe again—it will not be long—for Strasburg must be wiped out in success—that I shall send for you to help me, and I shall know that you will be ready. I see that the star which leads us both is the only light which shines for you. It holds your undivided soul, Chevalier—I am right?"

Francois turned his swiftly changing face toward the speaker, drawn with a feeling which swept over him; for a moment he did not answer. Then he spoke in a low tone.

"When a knight of the old time went to battle," he said, "he wore on his helmet the badge of his lady and carried the thought of her in his heart. A man fights better so."

And the silent prince understood.

CHAPTER XXV.

How Lucy Told.

The prince was gone. There had been festivities and formalities, great dinners, gatherings of the Virginia nobility to do honor to his highness at Roanoke house and elsewhere; everywhere the Chevalier Beaupre had been distinguished by his highness' most marked favor. And Lucy Hampton's eyes had shone with quiet delight to see it and to see the effect on her father. For the colonel, confused in his mind as to how it might be true, reluctantly acknowledged that there must be something of importance about this Chevalier Beaupre, that a prince should treat him as a brother. He believed that it would be best to treat him—he also—at least as a gentleman. So the French lessons were continued and the Jefferson troop was encouraged, and Francois was asked often to Roanoke house. And as the months rolled on he tried with every thoughtful and considerate effort to express to the little lady of the manor his gratitude for the goodness of her family. It troubled him more than a little that the early friendliness and intimacy of Harry Hampton seemed to be wearing off. The boy did not come so often to Carnifax, and when he came he did not stay for hours, for days sometimes, as was his way at first. He was uneasy with his friend, and his friend wondered and did not understand, but hesitated to push a way into the lad's heart. "He will tell me in time," thought Francois, and, sure of his own innocence, waited for the time.

Meantime he was going home. Going, much against the advice of the Norfolk doctor, who warned him that he was not yet well or strong, that the out-of-door life in the mild Virginia climate should be continued perhaps for two years more, before he went back to the agitation and effort of a Bonapartist agent in France. But he could not wait; he must see his old home, his mother, his father, and all the unforgotten faces. He longed to watch the black lashes curl upward from the blue of Alixe's eyes. He longed to hear her clear voice with its boyish note of courage. It would put new life into him, that voice. It was seven years now and more since he had left them all at a day's notice to go to Pietro in Italy—to a living death of five years, to many undreamed of happenings. The fever was on him and he must go home.

There was to be a celebration for the new and very fashionable cavalry troop of which Francois was the unofficial backbone and author. In the great grassy paddock at Bayly's Folly the proud mother of eighteen-year-old Caperton Bayly—first lieutenant, and the most finished horseman in the Virginia country—had invited the gentry from miles about to feast with her and to watch her son and his friends show how the Chevalier Beaupre had made them into soldiers. They came in shoals, driving from far off over bad roads in big lurching chariots, or riding in gay companies, mostly of older men and girls and young boys, because all of the gilded youth were in the ranks that day.

When the drill was over there was to be rough riding and jumping. Hurdles were swiftly dragged out and placed in a manner of ring.

"This one is very close to the bank," said Lucy Hampton, standing by Bluebird and watching as the negroes placed the bars. "If a horse refused and turned sharp and was foolish, he might go over. And the bank is steep."

"Lucy, you are a grandmotherly person," Clifford Stewart—who was another girl—threw at her. "You would like them all to ride in wadded wool dressing gowns, and to have a wall padded with cotton batting to guard them." And Lucy smiled and believed herself overcautious.

The excited horses came dancing up to the barriers and lifted and were over, with or without rapping, but not one, for the first round, refusing. Then the bars were raised six inches; six inches in mid-air is a large space when one must jump it. Caperton Bayly went at it first; his mother watched breathless as he flew forward, sitting erect, intense, his young eyes gleaming. Over went his great horse Traveler, and over the next and the next—all of them; but the white heels had struck the top bar twice—the beautiful, spirited performance was not perfect. Harry Hampton came next; all of the kindly multitude gazed eagerly, hoping that the boy to whom life had given less than the others might win this honor he wanted. The first bars without rapping; the second; and a suppressed sound of satisfaction, which might soon be a great roar of pleasure, hummed over the field. Black Hawk came rushing, snorting, pulling up to the third jump, the jump where Lucy stood. And as he came a little girl, high in a carriage, a chariot as one said then, flourished her scarlet parasol in the air, and lost hold of it, and it flew like a huge red bird into the course, close to the hurdle. And Black Hawk, strung to the highest point of his thoroughbred nerves, saw, and a horror of the flaming living thing, as it seemed, caught him, and he swerved at the bar and bolted—bolted straight for the steep slope.

A gasp went up from the three hundred, four hundred people; the boy was dashing to death; no one stirred; every muscle was rigid—the spectators were paralyzed. Not all. Francois from his babyhood had known how to think quickly, and these boys were his pride and his care; he had thought of that possible danger which Lucy had forseen; when the jumping began, mounted on his mare Aquarelle, he was posted near the head of the slope, not twenty yards from the hurdle, to be at hand in any contingency. When Harry's horse bolted, one touch put Aquarelle into motion. Like a line of brown light she dashed at right angles to the runaway—a line drawn to intercept the line of Black Hawk's flight. There was silence over the field—one second—two seconds—the lines shot to the angle—then it came—the shock they awaited.

Black Hawk, rushing, saw the other coming and swerved at the last moment—too late. The animals collided, not with full force, yet for a moment it looked like nothing but death for riders and mounts. Harry Hampton was thrown backward to the level field; Black Hawk galloped off, frantic and unhurt, across it; Aquarelle, one saw, lay on the very edge of the drop and was scrambling to her feet with liveliness enough to assure her safety; of Francois there was no sign. In half a minute the breathless still crowd was in an uproar, and a hundred men were jostling one another to reach the scene of the accident.

It was two minutes, perhaps, before Caperton Bayly, with a negro boy at his heels, with Jack Littleton and Harry Wise and a dozen other lads racing back of him, had plunged over the drop of land where Francois had disappeared. Two minutes are enough sometimes for a large event. In that two minutes Lucy Hampton, without conscious volition, by an instinct as simple and imperative as a bird's instinct to shield her young, had slipped from her horse Bluebird and flown across the level and down over the steep bank till she found herself holding Francois' dark head in her arms and heard her own voice saying words she had never said even to herself.

"I love you, I love you," she said, and if all the world heard she did not know or care. There was no world for her at that minute but the man lying with his head against her heart—dead it might be, but dead or alive, dearest. "I love you—love you—love you," she repeated, as if the soul were rushing out of her in the words.

With that the luminous great eyes opened, and Francois was looking at her, and she knew that he had heard. And then the training of a lifetime, of centuries, flooded back into her, and womanly reticence and maidenly shame and the feelings and attitude which are not primeval, as she had been primeval for that one mad moment. She drew back as she felt him trying to lift himself, and left him free and was on her feet, and then with a shock she was aware of another presence; turning she looked up into the angry glow of her cousin's eyes. He was not looking at her, but at the man who, dazed, hurt, was trying painfully to pull himself up. Harry Hampton glared at him.

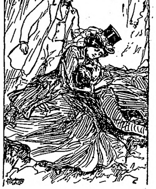
"We will settle this later," he brought out through his teeth. "I hope I can kill you." And Lucy cried out:

"Shame!" she cried. "He has just saved your life!"

"Damn him!" said Harry Hampton. "I do not want my life at his hands. I hate him more for saving me. Damn him!"

And Francois, clutching at a bush, things reeling about him unsteadily, looked up, friendly, wistful, at the boy cursing him.

With that there was an influx of population; the whole world, apparently, tumbled down the steep bank, every one far too preoccupied with help for the hero to remark Harry Hampton's grim humor.



She Found Herself Holding Francois' Dark Head in Her Arms.

Bobbie Burns' Granddaughter.

An action has been entered in Dumfries sheriff court by Miss Annie Beckett Burns of Cheltenham, the only surviving granddaughter of the Scottish poet, claiming "to have herself, as the nearest of kin, declared executrix of certain hitherto unconfirmed personal estate of the said Robert Burns." This is a sequel to the recent announcement that the Liverpool Athenaeum had sold for £5,000 the two volumes of Burns' poems and better known as the Glenriddell manuscripts, and that they were likely to go to America, an announcement which brought strong protests from Lord Roseberry, Dr. William Wallace and others.—Westminster Gazette.

Old American Coins.

Robert Morris, the financier of the Confederation, early in 1783, arranged with Benjamin Dudley to strike off some "pattern pieces" that could be placed before congress. On April 2 Dudley delivered to Morris some pieces, which were in reality the first coin struck having the name "United States coin." The particular specimens are known to numismatists as the "Nova Constellatio Paterns." They were of silver and denominated the "mark" and "quint." The first coins struck by the United States mint were some half dimes, in 1792.

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

Taxes seems to be higher in Red Lake county than in Pennington, but our ditch taxes are not due.

There does not seem to be any candidates for the job of secretary of state, up to the present time. What is Julius Schmall, an Eberhart Republican, or a Bull Mooser?

The free trade on sugar, has about driven the beet sugar industry out of business, but the price of sugar to the consumer is about as high as ever. Who is making the profit? The sugar trust of course.

This year promises to be the banner year for emigration to the Red River Valley as Northern Minnesota has compelled the other states to sit up and take notice of the farming advantages of this locality.

They have dug up that old dead cat again about that 1855 Indian Treaty prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in Northern Minnesota. It is now to be passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States, which will settle the question for all time, and the sooner they get it disposed of the better.

Judging from a published interview in the Duluth Herald, of James A. Peterson, Republican candidate for governor, that gentleman is certainly suffering from a violent attack of the "big head." He intimated that he did not propose to be governed by the convention to be held in Minneapolis on March 19th, unless he was the chosen candidate. He is also of the opinion that he can defeat Governor Eberhart at the primaries as the situation now stands, even if the other two candidates stays in the field. Did you ever see a more aggravated case of "big head?" The Republican Party leaders are sincere in calling that conference at Minneapolis on March 19th to agree on one candidate to oppose Eberhart, for all the party leaders now realize that the only way to defeat Eberhart is to unite the opposition to him. If Mr. Peterson does not go into this conference with an equal show with the other candidates he certainly is not entitled to the support of the party. If he stays out and breaks up the conference and all the other candidates stays in, as they are now, it will be a close race between him and Lee. as to who will get the most votes, for Sam Iverson will get more votes in this state for the Republican nomination for governor than both of them, and yet they may by staying in the fight draw votes enough away from him to give Eberhart the nomination. But that is as far as Adolph will get toward the governorship for he will be defeated next November as the people are determined to put that state machine out of business.

The per capita cost of state government in Minnesota is said to be $10.49. This is an increase of two thirds over what the per capita cost was only four years ago. The total state expenditures for this year in Minnesota is over twenty one millions. Larger western states are spending much less. Missouri spends nine millions, Michigan, seven millions, Iowa less than six million and Kansas less than five millions. We probably get value received for a large part of our enormous expenditures, but the agitation for economy in state administration should be supported by every tax payer.—Norman County Index.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate, I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th. 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON,

THE LARGE RAILROAD TAXES

The discussion of state taxes based on the just issued state auditor's abstract should not leave out of account the fact that these figures include only direct taxation,

They do not include the state's large revenues from other sources, which though indirect, the people pay just as surely as they pay direct taxes. Indeed direct taxes are shared in by everybody, while not everybody pays direct taxes,

The railroads, for instance, this year will pay into the state treasury $5,733,713.10, which is $513,000 more than the total amount raised by direct state taxes, and is the highest amount ever paid by the railroads in this state. The increase is due not only to good railroad business—railroad taxes are based on earnings—but to the increase of the railroad tax rate from four per cent to five. In the results of this increase this newspaper has a particular interest because it can modestly claim to have done its share in bringing it about. It was the first newspaper in Minnesota to advocate it, and for a time the only one

But the railroad taxes are not all. Hundreds of thousands of dollars come in from other indirect sources, and the fact that these indirect taxes have been multiplied several times in the last few years, and that the direct state tax levies and the state tax rate have increased alarmingly just the same, adds double emphasis to the need of a business accounting of state finances.—The Duluth Herald.

Mr. Iverson practically [illegible] platform in one paragraph. [illegible] his statement is more elaborate [illegible] emphasizes the fact that intelligent economy means: "Cut out all needless expense; reduce taxation; protect public health; develop water resources and promote manufacturing and shipping; conserve and restore natural resources; to build up agriculture and farm life; to defend wage earners and salaried men, women and children from the greed and avarice of soulless employers; to aid in reclaiming and settling unoccupied lands; to foster such transportation laws as will give every community, large or small, an equal chance for existence, and in general to inculcate the doctrine of the Golden Rule among our citizens in all vocations."

This is a mighty strong, clear and definite platform, and no man is better acquainted with the needs of Minnesota than is Sam Iverson, and we know of no man in the Republican party who is better equipped by experience and knowledge to become governor of this state than he. (Alexandria Post-News.)

State Auditor Iverson, who for years has enjoyed an enviable reputation as a state official and as a citizen of the state, announces that he will be a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor. There are several planks to his platform—economy in public expenditures, the enforcement of the liquor laws, the extension of civil service in state departments, a board of directors of state department heads to insure co-operation of all in securing the state's welfare, and woman suffrage, but that on which he places the strongest emphasis is economy. Mr. Iverson is of the opinion that it is time to call a halt in all public expenditures and apply common sense business principles to the management of our state institutions. In support of his position he cites the fact that state expenditures have increased from $2,924,785 in 1900 to $6,868,830 in 1910, the per capita cost increasing from $1.67 on a population of 1,751,000 to $3.21 on a population of 2,075,000. Since 1910 expenditures have been increasing. Mr. Iverson's protest against increased public expenditures will meet with approval.

BOB DUNN'S VIEWS.

(Princeton Union.)

State Auditor Iverson has announced his candidacy for the governorship. The announcement did not surprise anyone, although it came sooner than expected. Accompanying Mr. Iverson's declaration of intentions is a confession of faith and manifold specious promises.

That Mr. Iverson has a large following throughout the state goes without saying; nevertheless he will discover that the pathway to the governor's office is not bestrewn with roses.

Mr. Iverson is the first pronounced candidate in the field. It is generally understood that Governor Eberhart will ask for a third elective term. Several others may also try for the Republican nomination. There will be no dearth of candidates, and Mr. Iverson will profit as much from a multiplicity of candidates as Governor Eberhart [illegible]

T. S. JACOBSON licensed auctioneer, Highlanding, Minn. Prompt attention given to auction sales of farm property.

Subscribe for The Sunbeam. Pay up your back Subscription.

March came in like a lion, and it is now due to go out like a lamb.

The roads are now in very bad condition. as the hauling of heavy loads over them has cut them up awful bad.

Andrew Nelson is now sawing lumber at his mill east of Highlanding and has plenty of poplar lumber for sale.

C. L. Clark has taken the contract to haul the lumber out from Thief River Falls for the High landing ferry, which the county will put in this spring.

Gunder Asbjornson passed by here yesterday on his way to the Highlanding Creamery to put in a bid for the season's butter milk as he will raise a lot of hogs this year.

Wm. Swanson is going to sell off his stock and farm machinery and will take a years rest from farming. His auction sale is to be held March 13th.

James O'Brien will hold his auction sale of his horses, cattle and farm machinery and articles too numerous to mention on next Thursday, March 13th.
Engvold Husby, Auctioneer.
Henry J. Enderlee, Clerk.

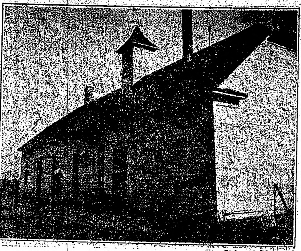
On Saturday March 14th, there will be a big auction sale of farm machinery and stock, on section 19, Town of Johnson, six miles south of Lillo Post Office. Time will be given until November 1st on all sums over $10.00.

The Highlanding Creamery will start up for the season's run on March 16th, all patrons are requested to bring in cream on that day. The Association has employed Wm. Lindal, the same butter maker that they had last year, for this season.

A Chicago Tailoring Establishment are sending out circulars offering woolen suits of clothes for $9.85 which they used to charged $25.00 for before the free trade come in. They now import the cloth direct from England and the English farmers raise the sheep for the wool and English laborers manufacture it, but the devil of it is, where is the American farmer going to get hold of the $9.85 to buy the suit with? They had a way of getting the $25.00 but they can't get the $9.85. See the point my friend,

There is something wrong with our proposed Electric Line Railroad. we do not know just what, but one of the representatives of the Thief River Falls Company was up this week offering to return the stock taken in it by the farmers. There is a rumor afloat that the Soo Line of Railroad have bought them out, but whether it is the intention of that company to build the line, or just hire the other fellows not to build it, and compel us to haul our grain to the lines already built, will develop later on.

We notice that some of the candidates for county office are beginning to send out circular letters, soliciting support. This will help the income of the post office department to some extent, and as it does not do anyone any harm, or them any good. We suppose there is no objection to them making their campaign after this style. But if they will call on the people that they have sent circulars to, after they are defeated they are likely to hear that the voter did not know that they were running. While the live wire who placed his name before the voters in their local papers will walk off with the office.



High Landing Creamery.

This creamery was built in 1908, and has been a source of cash income to the farmers of this locality ever since that time.

The Creamery will start up for the season on March 16th, and a large increase of patronage is expected for this year.

There was a fall of about six inches of very damp snow yesterday morning, which will make a lot of water for the ditches to carry into the river when the spring thaw arrives.

Miss Sarah Vaughan left for a vacation and visit to friends and relatives at Thief River Falls and Minneapolis on Wednesday. She expects to be absent until the last of March.

BIDS WANTED,

Bids will be received by the Highlanding Co operative Creamery Association up to March 14th 1914 for the building of a ferry at Highlanding, Minnesota. Plans and specifications on file at the secretary's office.

FRANK DAY'S HOROSCOPE.

(Fairmont Sentinel.)

Mr. Iverson is energetic, able, resourceful; he has an army of friends and acquaintances; he knows the game of politics like a book; he is rich in qualifications for the position; and he has a record that should be a tower of strength in support of his cause.

Governor Eberhart, although backed by what is considered the most potent influence in Minnesota politics, will find in Auditor Iverson a foeman that will give him the battle of his life. It is too early to predict the outcome, but if the contest resolves itself into a battle between Eberhart and Iverson, we should say that the odds would favor the auditor. But a third or fourth candidate is quite likely to complicate the situation, with a campaign of such tenseness and acrimony that a good, clean Democrat would have an excellent chance in November.

WOULD NOT BACK DOWN.

(Redwood Falls Gazette.)

Lovers of alliteration will be found of the slogan of the coming gubernatorial campaign. Expenditure—economy—efficiency—election. And Eberhart would be a beautiful climax as far as euphony goes. But S. G. has always appeared to us as a person who wouldn't back down for the sake of a poetic expression. Anyway poetic license often permits an I for an E.

Steinitz Was Defiant.

A story is told of an altercation between Wilhelm Steinitz and Gustave Epstein. The latter was one of the most influential and richest bankers in Vienna and was very fond of a game of chess. When Steinitz was a young man he used to play frequently at the Vienna Chess club and on one occasion engaged the famous banker. The game became very complicated, and Steinitz studied the board longer than usual. His opponent grew impatient and at last drawled out sarcastically, "Well?" Steinitz silently continued the game, and after a time it went in his favor. The banker then began to think deeply, taking considerable time before moving a piece. Steinitz could not resist the temptation to utter a long drawn out "Well?" "Sir, don't forget who you are and who I am!" roared Epstein angrily. Steinitz immediately retorted, "On the bourse you are Epstein and I am Steinitz; over the board I am Epstein and you are Steinitz!"

Cutting Out a Meal.

Physicians are commonly advising patients whose troubles arise from overeating—and these are legion—to cut out one meal, preferably breakfast. The London Lancet remarks that the reason for this is that "after a night's sleep the bodily strength, nervous and muscular, is at its highest, and work can be carried on without food. The machine is running strongly and no fuel is required for the time being." Men engaged in literary or intellectual work can often do their very best in the early morning before breakfast.

The Lancet deprecates the heavy breakfast and advocates the "coffee and rolls," which are all that is eaten for breakfast on the continent of Europe, especially for men whose work is of the brain rather than of the muscles. These men, it says, should "relegate anything approaching a hearty meal to the period of relaxation, the evening."

WHAT AN OHIOAN

HAS TO SAY ABOUT CONDITIONS IN WESTERN CANADA.

W. E. Lewis formerly lived near Dayton, Ohio. He went to Saskatchewan seven years ago with $1,800 in money, a carload of household effects and farm implements, including four horses and three cows. Of course, the first year he only got feed from the crops, but the second year had 100 acres in wheat which made over 2,800 bushels. He has not had a failure in crop, and at present has 22 head of horses, 15 head of cattle and 35 hogs, and owns 1,120 acres of land, all under cultivation. He has been offered $35 an acre for his land, and should he care to dispose of his holdings he could pay all his debts and have $30,000 to the good; but, as he says, "Where could I go to invest my money and get as good returns." He continues in his letter to the immigration department, August, 1912:

"We have equally as good if not better prospects for crops this year as we had three years ago, when our wheat ranged from 30 to 48 bushels per acre. I never believed such crops could be raised until I saw them myself. I had 15 acres that year that made 50 bushels to the acre. Our harvest will be ready by the 12th. We have this season in crop 400 acres of wheat, 125 of oats, 90 of flax and run three binders with four men to do the stooking. We certainly like this country and the winters, although the winters are cold at times, but we do not suffer as one would think. What we have accomplished here can be duplicated in almost any of the new districts."—Advertisement.

DISSATISFIED TO THE END

Surely Must Be Conceded That Condemned Man Was Much Inclined to Be Finicky.

He wasn't even satisfied when they tried him for murder and sentenced him to be hanged. He grumbled about his cell by day and about his mattress by night, and on the morning fixed for his execution he grumbled about the way his breakfast had been prepared.

He grumbled when they led him forth about the distance he had to walk between his cell and the scaffold, and he said he was sure it was going to rain. At last they got him into position, and just as the hangman was about to perform his duty, the condemned man grumbled out:

"Say, gov'nor, this plank don't seem any too safe to me!"

WOMEN of the United States, look to your laurels!

You've carried off all the worth while prizes in international beauty contests for a long, long time.

Your good looks, your superior intelligence, your keen wit and airy grace, to say nothing of your numerous other surpassing qualities and accomplishments, have won for you an enviable position among the women of the world.

In fact, you have worked your way up until in recent years your supremacy has been unquestioned. You are conceded the most beautiful, the most accomplished, the most sought after women in the world.

Beware! Your supremacy is threatened. Your pedestal is insecure. The world's admiration, which you so long have held, at some not distant day may be transferred to the women of another quarter of the globe.

Your competitors for the world's admiration are close upon your heels. They have come upon you all unawares; so quietly, in fact, that it's a two to one wager you don't even know who they are.

Who are they?

The women of Latin-America.

Probably you won't believe this. You'll laugh and say that the principal business of Latin-America is to raise comic opera revolutions, not women capable of wresting from you the laurels which your beauty and charm have won.

If you think that way, just read what Mrs. Sherrill, the wife of the American minister to Argentina, has to say about the women of the southern republics.

"They dress better, look better and have finer manners than any other women in the world," declares Mrs. Sherrill. "They are enchanting creatures, and now Europe is learning of their wonderful charm. They are fond of home life and make ideal mothers, although they are not domestic to a sordid degree. They are as fond of society as the women of the United States, only they are absolutely without the faintest trace of snobbishness, which is probably due to their breeding. They are vastly well informed and well bred women, and strangely enough their social obligations are never such as to interfere with their home life. The women are good mothers and are devoted to their large families."

Europe, where the Yankee girl has so long ruled a favorite, has fallen victim to the Latin-American girl's charms. Whether she appear in her favorite Paris, or in other centers of fashion or recreation, she is surrounded by a crowd of admirers. She has the entree to exclusive drawing rooms. At her chateaux, which she loves to hire for the season that she may entertain on her own account, she is always sure of as many guests as she desires. She is the joy of continental modistes, and the despair of those who would wear gowns such as hers.

It must be admitted that her wealth in worldly possessions does add to her attractiveness to many eyes. The continent is filled with impecunious younger sons of varied brands of aristocracy, and few would in the least mind marrying the newest American girl because of her great wealth. Still, even without her wealth she would deserve all the praise that has been heaped upon her.

The new American girl of the Latin states is strangely composite of the old and the new order of things which her land has known. In the modern world's capitals and fashionable centers she is indeed a woman of the present; but in Latin-America she is a woman of the past. In her native home still persists an order of things which in many respects is almost medieval. The stamp of Spain, so strongly seen on her, is also seen on the religion, the language, and the social creed of this girl. The laws and the landscape of her people alike are still dominated by this ancient influence. Indeed, Spain itself has infinitely more variety in speech and custom than is seen in the vast territory it has peopled, and the people of Valparaiso, Bogota, and Caracas speak better Castilian than usually is heard in Madrid and Cadiz.

Hence it is that the Latin-American woman has but little of the freedom enjoyed by the American girl she now would rival. There still exists between the sexes that armed neutrality which is a tradition of the Spanish blood. Matrimony still is a lottery. The would-be husband never sees his wife alone until they are married. His negotiations for her hand are largely because the Roman Catholic church dominates all society, and it recognizes no divorce. In addition, the Latin-American woman, wrapped up in her family, for children generally are numerous, endures many indignities rather than separate from her husband and babies.

The United States knows them best and most pleasantly through their representatives connected with the diplomatic corps in Washington. They are almost without exception representatives of the modern trend in Latin-American development. They have won for themselves in official society a regard based primarily upon their own beauty and charm, and only secondarily upon their official position.

One of the most prominent of these women is Mme. Pezet, wife of the minister from Peru. She is considered a great beauty, and is a leader in diplomatic society. Of equal charm and beauty are Mme. Malbran, bride of the first secretary of the Argentine legation; Mme. Suarez, wife of the minister from Chile; Senora de la Cueva, wife of the first secretary of the Mexican legation; Mme. de Naon, wife of the Argentine minister, and Senora Castrillo, wife of the new minister from Nicaragua, who is a recent arrival at Washington.

Among the younger Latin-American women who have charmed social Washington, and whose beauty vies with that of their northern sisters, are Senorita Dona Luz Mendez, daughter of the minister from Guatemala; Senorita Marta Calvo, talented daughter of the minster from Costa Rica; Senorita Amelia Mejia, daughter of the minister from Salvador, and the young bride of Don Alejandro Herquinigo, of the Chilean legation, who before her recent marriage was Senorita Malvina de pena, daughter of the minister from Uruguay.

HOW TO TELL COUNTERFEITS

The hand is quicker than the eye in detecting fraudulent bank notes. The "feel" of the distinctive paper used by the government is the first warning signal that the money tendered is bad. This paper is distinctive not alone because of the introduction of silk fiber in the bill itself, but because of the treatment the stock receives in printing. The silk threads are sometimes imitated by pen-and-ink lines, but these do not bear close examination. The engraving has been the greatest protection, for even photo-engraving fails to bring out the proper color values, and retouching by the graving tool makes the lines heavy and irregular. Photography also fails in reproducing the color of the seal, which must be washed in with water colors, the black lines of the engraving showing through in counterfeits. The most dangerous counterfeit is that in which a genuine bill of lower denomination is bleached out and a false plate showing a high denomination placed upon it. Here is a genuine bank bill. It has the "feel." The silk threads are present. If the engraving is fairly well done and the color of approximate correctness it becomes a dangerous counterfeit, and bankers are at once warned to be on the watch for it. In this connection the "check letter" often comes into play. All government notes are printed of one denomination, four on a sheet, and are lettered respectively A, B, C and D. Each note bears a treasury number. If, when that number is divided by four there remains one, the check letter should be A; if two remains, the letter should be B; if three, then C, and if there is no remainder, D. If the result shows otherwise then the numbering is wrong and the note is a counterfeit. All denominations from $1 to $1,000 have been counterfeited, as well as all our coins. The most usual method of defrauding when gold coins are handled is to saw the coins in half, extract the interior, and fill with base metal.

FREE ADVICE TO SICK WOMEN

Thousands Have Been Helped By Common Sense Suggestions.

Women suffering from any form of female ills are invited to communicate promptly with the woman's private correspondence department of the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence. A woman can freely talk of her private illness to a woman; thus has been established a confidential correspondence which has extended over many years and which has never been broken. Never have they published a testimonial or used a letter without the written consent of the writer, and never has the Company allowed these confidential letters to get out of their possession, as the hundreds of thousands of them in their files will attest.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM

Out of the vast volume of experience which they have to draw from, it is more than possible that they possess the very knowledge needed in your case. Nothing is asked in return except your good will, and their advice has helped thousands. Surely any woman, rich or poor, should be glad to take advantage of this generous offer of assistance. Address Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., (confidential) Lynn, Mass.

Every woman ought to have Lydia E. Pinkham's 80-page Text Book. It is not a book for general distribution, as it is too expensive. It is free and only obtainable by mail. Write for it today.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

COSTS STATE $30 FOR EACH PUPIL

TAX STATISTICS SHOW OVER $13,679,000 WAS PAID IN FOR EDUCATION.

450,000 SCHOOL CHILDREN

Levies for Schools Increased Materially During Past Year Over Preceding Assessments—Cost Per Capita More.

St. Paul.—The man who has three children in the public schools and pays, say, only $15 taxes, is getting more than his money's worth because it is costing $30 each to educate his children for one year and $75 of the $90 it takes to teach his youngsters is paid by other taxpayers.

$13,679,299 for Schools.

Of course the cost differs in different sections, but figures prepared by the state auditor from the 1913 tax lists show taxes aggregating $13,679,299.95 were levied last year for school purposes by the state, and the various school districts.

C. G. Schulz, state superintendent of education, estimates 450,000 children are attending school in Minnesota. Dividing the total levy by this number it is found that the average cost per child is approximately $30. This, however, does not take into consideration about $1,600,000 of state aid distributed to schools which is the income from the permanent turst funds.

School Levies Higher.

The school levies have increased materially during the last year, the total raised in 1912 being $11,830,694.40, or $1,848,535.55 less than in 1913. Going back ten years ago, the total was $7,331,702.23, an increase of $6,347,527.72 in a single decade.

The cost of education per capita also is increasing, as the number of pupils has not kept pace with the expenditures. Even ten years ago there were nearly 380,000 pupils in Minnesota schools, and these were educated at nearly half the expense the 450,000 now are entailing.

FUNERAL OF CAPT. SELLWOOD

Funeral of Duluth Millionaire Is Held—Last of the Mining Captains.

Duluth.—The funeral of Captain Joseph Sellwood was held Friday afternoon from the family residence. Rev. J. W. Hoffman, pastor of the First Methodist church, of which Mr. Sellwood was a member, conducted the services.

Captain Sellwood was one of the last of the old crowd of mining captains in the early days of the upper peninsula of Michigan. He was born in Cornwall, England, in 1846, came to the upper peninsula in 1865 and to the Minnesota iron country in 1886. For years he was in charge of the Chandler mine and the properties of the Minnesota Iron Mining company. When the Steel corporation was formed he withdrew and became one of the biggest independent operators on the Minnesota ranges.

Aside from his mining interests he was president of five national banks in this state and Michigan. He was many times a millionaire, but in spirit and attitude was the old-fashioned miner whom everybody knew and trusted.

WILL GROW MORE ALFALFA

Success of Wadena Farmers Arouses Interest of Whole County and Good Results Will Follow.

Wadena.—One hundred acres of alfalfa on a single farm will be grown in Wadena county next season. Last year H. I. Davey, a farmer, had forty acres in alfalfa of the Grimm variety. He cut three good crops, each averaging one and one-half tons to the acre.

Nearly 100 farmers of Wadena county have made arrangements to sow from five to ten acres of alfalfa in the spring. The farmers' club of Wadena has taken up the matter of securing seed and a committee has been appointed for the purpose.

The business men of Wadena village are co-operating with the farmers' committee and an adequate supply of Grimm's alfalfa from Montana will be secured.

N. P. Planning Improvements.

St. Paul.—Between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 will be spent for new rails during the coming year by the Northern Pacific. The exact amount to be expended and the sections of track which will be relaid are being determined by officials of the road who now are in Tacoma, Wash., on an inspection trip of the entire system.

At the close of the present trip the board of directors will be asked to authorize the expenditure of large sums for the improvement of terminals and line.

1,000 HARDWARE MEN MEET

Convention Held in Minneapolis—Many Sales Result From Comprehensive Display.

Minneapolis.—The Minnesota Retail Hardware association eclipsed the records of all previous gatherings.

Two amendments to existing laws were urged. The first would have the act directed against fraudulent advertising amended so that the enforcement would rest with the state dairy and food commission.

The second proposed amendment would abolish fees levied upon merchants when inspection of weights and measures is made and have the state pay the expense. The committee recommendation carries the qualification that the application should be only to weights and measures where used and not to inspection at manufactories.

With more than 1,000 dealers in attendance, the exhibition of hardware goods on the main floor and along the balconies of the armory not only attracted the attention of searchers after the latest of articles, but resulted in many sales to the benefit of jobbers.

LUTHERANS FAVOR UNION

Synod, Hauge and United Societies Fraterni[illegible] the Fergus Fal[illegible]eting.

Fergus Falls.—A joint meeting of the Synod Lutheran churches, the Hague churches and the United Lutheran churches of this part of the state was held in this city in connection with the proposed union which is likely to be brought about soon. These three great Norwegian Lutheran bodies are steadily drawing closer together, and plans for a union have met with general approval at their national gatherings.

Each church holds circuit meetings from time to time for the discussion of various doctrinal subjects and in this instance it was decided to hold a joint district meeting for the purpose of getting acquainted, in view of the probability that the three churches will become one eventually.

The meeting proved very successful, there being thirty ministers and over four hundred lay delegates in attendance. The sentiment seemed to be one of thorough friendliness to the idea of a union.

WESTBROOK BANK IS CLOSED

Depositors Likely to Be Paid in Full—Cashier Arrested at Instance of Examiner.

Westbrook. — The Citizens' State bank has been closed by K. S. Chase, state bank examiner, who also caused the arrest of Cashier C. A. Zieska on a grand larceny charge involving $2,000.

The bank's capital and surplus are $30,000, with $125,000 on deposit, and the cashier is under a $10,000 bond in the National Surety company. It is thought depositors will be paid in full and the bank reopened soon.

Frank W. Parsons, a real estate dealer at Westbrook, filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy in federal court in Mankato yesterday. His liabilities are given as $10,435, with assets of $2,235.

Great Northern Engine Wrecked.

Moorhead.—Local passenger train No. 12 on the Great Northern, running between Fargo and Minneapolis and leaving Moorhead at 8 a. m. Tuesday, was wrecked a mile east of this station. The axle connecting the drive wheels of the locomotive broke down and the engine was fairly stripped of its running gear. No one on the engine or in the cars was injured, as the train was running slowly. The cars were pulled back into Moorhead and the track cleared.

Chemist May Lose Sight.

Minneapolis.—Stephen Anthony, chemist in the university farm school and a captain in the Greek army for a year during the recent Balkan war, was so badly hurt by an explosion of chemicals that he may lose his eyesight. He was working alone in a laboratory at the school. Students in an adjoining room heard the boom of the explosion and ran in. They found Mr. Anthony with arms over his eyes and in great pain.

Minnesota Democrats in Love Feast.

Minneapolis — Fully three hundred Democrats were turned away from the West hotel here Tuesday night, being unable to crowd in for the big "get-together" banquet of the state organization. Platform resolutions were adopted and candidate possibilities discussed.

Duluth Millionaire Passes Away.

Duluth.—After a protracted illness which began last Christmas, when he was suddenly taken ill with a cold, Captain Sellwood, Duluth's pioneer capitalist, mine owner and banker and one of the most prominent business men of the Northwest, passed away at the family residence. He had been in poor health for the last two or three years. The late Captain Sellwood was several times a millionaire and his income has been estimated at $400,000 per year.

DEMOCRATS TO MEET MAR. 31

General Conference to Pick Candidate—Banquet Draws Large Number.

Minneapolis.—Democrats of Minnesota will meet March 31 in a state delegate conference in the St. Paul auditorium "to consider the welfare of the party and its organization." County mass conventions to elect delegates will take place in each county March 24, and will also provide for county and precinct democratic organizations. Definite arrangements for the meetings were determined by the democratic state executive committee, which met here, carrying out the decision of the state conference held Tuesday. The main purpose of the state gathering is to bring out a candidate for governor.

The greatest democratic gathering Minneapolis has seen in twelve years was the get-together banquet at the West hotel Tuesday night. Though there were no noted speakers as drawing cards, the banquet played to standing room only, and the 600 reserved seats were hardly half enough to supply the demand. Out-of-town guests numbered 300 or more and as nearly all of them had made reservations, they were taken care of. Many twin city men were unable to get seats. A democratic motion picture exhibition and portrait and cartoon lantern slides were shown at intervals.

BUTTERMAKERS FORM LEAGUE

Four Counties Organize at Wadena Meeting for Mutual Benefit.

Wadena.—Twenty-six buttermakers and others interested in dairying met in this city and organized The Combined Creamery association. State Creamery Inspector Austin of Fergus Falls started the movement and is directly responsible for the meetings.

The object of the organization is to further the interests of buttermakers in Wadena, Otter Tail, Becker and Grant counties. There are fifty-one in this territory.

H. A. Goetsch, buttermaker at the farmers' co-operative creamery in this city, was elected president and Adin Nelson of Fergus Falls, vice president of the organization. Max Siegel of Bertha was chosen second vice president, James Simpson of Deer Creek, secretary and Oscar Anderson of Frazee, treasurer.

A motion to make Wadena the permanent meeting place was later withdrawn and the selection of a place for each meeting was left in the hands of the officers with power to act. The president then appointed a committee on by-laws, consisting of C. L. Cole of Minneapolis, M. Sondergard, St. Paul, and A. Nelson, Fergus Falls.

Several of the buttermakers brought butter with them and the scores ranged from 90 to 93¼.

HUNTING LICENSES PAY WELL

Five Counties Turn in Nearly $20,000 Revenue From This Source.

St. Paul.—Five counties in Minnesota turned nearly $20,000 into the state treasury from the sale of hunting licenses. St. Louis led with a total of $7,619.16. Then come Hennepin with $5,633.90; Ramsey, $4,304.70; Itasca, $1,259.10, and Carlton, $1,020.60. Each of these counties made greater returns on hunting licenses than ever before, according to H. A. Rider, executive agent of the game and fish commission.

None of this money goes to the commission, however, as the legislature in its late session voted the game and fish commission a lump sum and appropriated all the revenues, much to the disgust of the members who find their work handicapped by the lack of adequate funds.

"We are compelled to pay express charges on confiscated game, guns and nets out of our appropriation," explained Mr. Rider, "but we can't even have the sums refunded to the commission. The present system of handling the finances of the ocmmission would be all right if the legislature had made a proper allowance for the work the commission is called upon to do."

Tri-County Carriers Meet.

Red Wing.—Rural mailcarriers of Goodhue, Wabasha and Dakota counties, members of the Tri-County Rural Carriers' association, held their annual convention here Tuesday. President Harry Hines of Cannon Falls presided. Mayor John J. Ferris welcomed the delegates. The following officers were elected: President, H. F. Hines, Cannon Falls; vice president, Edward Nelson, Zumbrota; secretary-treasurer, Frank Schenach, Red Wing.

Barnesville Sued by State.

Barnesville.—A suit to test the validity of the gross earnings tax law as applied to municipal owned telephone plants has been brought by the state against this city and will be tried at the spring term of district court in Moorhead. Papers were served on Mayor Haagenson last week. The amount sued for is $1,567.24, for the 3 per cent tax on earnings of the local telephone exchange from 1903 to 1912. The case is attracting much attention as it will determine the status of municipal owned telephones.

Feel All Used Up?

Ever feel that you can go no further—that you must have rest for that lame and aching back—relief from that constant, dead-tired feeling?

Have you suspected your kidneys? Kidney disease shows itself in backache, nervous troubles and disorders of the kidney secretions. If tired, worried, lame, rheumatic, dizzy and nervous don't let a possible weakness of the kidneys escape attention until it turns into a case of gravel, dropsy or Bright's disease.

Sick kidneys go from bad to worse. Their useful work of filtering the blood is only partly done. Poisons that should be passed out with the kidney secretions are held in the blood, circulating freely, attacking muscles, nerves and vital organs. The kidneys inflame, swell and throb, and that is the cause of sharp pains in the back, or that dull, constant heavy ache.

For quick help use Doan's Kidney Pills. No other kidney remedy is used and recommended so generally. Take them when you feel the first bad backache, or see the first disturbance of the kidney secretions. Doan's have brought new life and strength to thousands of despairing men and women, and there is nothing in the remedy to cause any harm or start a pill-taking habit.

DOCTORS' TREATMENT FAILED

Colorado Man Tells a Story of Awful Suffering.

L. M. Drake, 232 Elati St., Denver, Colo., says: "I was so bad with kidney complaint that I thought I was going to die. My feet were terribly swollen and I couldn't wear my shoes. My limbs swelled too and my heart wasn't just right; I often had to gasp for breath. For months I couldn't work and I couldn't hobble a block without sitting down to rest. For several days there wouldn't be a free flow of the kidney secretions and the passages were terribly scalding. Doctors didn't help me and one remedy after another failed. A relative wrote me to use Doan's Kidney Pills and the first box brought wonderful relief. The kidney secretions got all right and the swelling went down. In a short time I went back to work in good health. Doan's Kidney Pills alone cured me and the cure has been permanent. I hope that other kidney sufferers will read about my experience and give Doan's Kidney Pills a trial."

No Argument.

Andrew Carnegie, apropos of a war advocate, told a New York reporter a little story.

"The arguments of this war advocate—the argument that warfare perfects a man's character, for example—are just as senseless as that of the Bullfrog fire-eater.

"The sheriff of Bullfrog told a fire-eater that, since he had already killed seven men, he must cease to go armed.

"'What!' roared the fire-eater. 'What, me not go armed? And every little Bullfrog wild flower has a pistol and shoots!'"

ERUPTION ON ANKLE BURNED

Kingsville, Mo.—"My trouble began eighteen years ago. Nearly half of the time there were running sores around my ankle; sometimes it would be two years at a time before they were healed. There were many nights I did not sleep because of the great suffering. The sores were deep running ones and so sore that I could not bear for anything to touch them. They would burn all the time and sting like a lot of bees were confined around my ankle. I could not bear to scratch it, it was always so sensitive to the touch. I could not let my clothes touch it. The skin was very red. I made what I called a cap out of white felt, blotting paper and soft white cloth to hold it in shape. This I wore night and day.

"I tried many remedies for most of the eighteen years with no effect. Last summer I sent for some Cuticura Soap and Ointment. The very first time I used Cuticura Soap and Ointment I gained relief; they relieved the pain right then. It was three months from the time I commenced using Cuticura Soap and Ointment until the sores were entirely healed. I have not been troubled since and my ankle seems perfectly well." (Signed) Mrs. Charles E. Brooke, Oct. 22, 1912.

Matter of Environment.

The Mexican student was watching his first northern football game. It held his interest firmly. His face grew flushed, his arms were flung out, he shouted hoarsely:

"Do you call thees a game?" he asked of the man at his right.

"Sure," was the reply. "What would you call it?"

"In my country," said the stranger from across the border, "we would call it a seven-day pitched battle!"

DRUG HOUSE ENJOINED BY FEDERAL COURT

Judge Jeremiah Neterer, of the United States district court, to-day granted a permanent injunction in behalf of the Centaur Company of New York, the manufacturers of Fletcher's Castoria, against the Stewart & Holmes Drug Company of this city.

The controversy arose from the simulating of the labels of this well-known preparation, and from the evidence filed in the case it was shown that the infringing label was first discovered on sale in Honolulu, and was traced to its origin here in Seattle.

The defendant company is one of the oldest and largest concerns of its kind in the Northwest.

The decree carries with it an order that the Stewart & Holmes Company recall the goods which are on the market under the infringing label, and to pay all costs in the suit and damages assessed at $400.—Seattle, Wash., "Times."—Adv.

LITTLE CHANCE TO LAND HIM

Either Young Man Was Very Slow or the Bait Was Not Sufficiently Attractive.

Reginald Vanderbilt said at a pre-Easter wedding in New York:

"How interesting it would be if we could know how all these pretty weddings came about! Often, no doubt, the girls themselves brought them about, unless, indeed, the man was too inordinately dense, like Travers.

"Travers met a pretty girl last winter in Bermuda. He danced with her, he wheeled with her for strawberries and cream, and he bathed with her in the pretty blue pool with its lining of azure tiles.

"But he didn't propose. Was he too bashful? The girl, at any rate, one afternoon in a tea garden, offered to read his future, and, holding his big brown hand in her slim white one, she murmured, as her finger moved delicately across his palm:

"'This line indicates that before you lies—happiness.'

"She paused, with downcast eyes. But nothing followed. The young man sat beside her, grinning sheepishly. Her lip curled in disdain, and she added, in a clear, cold voice:

"'But this other line indicates that you'll never overtake that future. You're too slow.'"

Bit Inhuman.

Orville Wright was condemning the craze of scientific management. "There was something inhuman about it," he said. "It always reminded me of cruel old Cornelius Husk. Old Cornelius Husk entered the general store one day and demanded a setting of eggs. 'Have you got a cluckin' hen?' asked the storekeeper. 'No,' replied cruel old Corn. 'No, I ain't got no clucker; but a motorcycle run over our old Plymouth Rock and broke her leg, and I thought she might as well hatch out some eggs as lay around doin' nothin'.'"

1913 RECORD

Magnificent Crops in all Western Canada

All parts of the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have produced wonderful yields of Wheat, Oats, Barley and Flax. Wheat graded from Contract to No. 1 Hard, weighed heavy and yielded from 20 to 45 bushels per acre; 22 bushels was about the total average. Mixed Farming may be considered fully as profitable an industry as grain raising. The excellent grasses full of nutrition, are the only food required either for beef or dairy purposes. In 1912, and again in 1913, at Chicago, Manitoba carried off the Championship for beef steer. Good schools, markets convenient, climate excellent. For the homesteader, the man who wishes to farm extensively, or the investor, Canada offers the biggest opportunity of any place on the continent.

The Rubies of the Sacrifice

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

Nikolai and I made the acquaintance of the Brahmin high priest just as the City of Newcastle was emerging from the torrid stretches of the Red sea into the cooler waters of the Indian ocean. We were eight days out from Southampton, with twelve days more to pass before making Calcutta, our destination. We had gone thither attracted by the coronation ceremonies, thinking that some financial profit ought to accrue to us when rajahs and high officers of state were flocking to attend the magnificence of the Viceroy's durbar.

The priest was dressed in the full uniform or regalia of his order, and attended by two devoted servitors, who cooked his rice lest he should be contaminated by sharing the same meal as that of the outcasts. I noticed, too, that when he walked on the deck he took care that the shadow of no passenger should fall athwart him. It was whispered at the captain's table that he was a man of extreme sanctity who, having spent ten years in meditation among the forests of the Hindu Kush, had gone voluntarily to England to offer spiritual blessing's to England's new ruler. And yet—he had been educated at Cambridge!

It came upon me with a sort of shock at first to hear this pundit, venerable in dignities if not in years, discuss with Nikolai the latest scientific discoveries, pragmatism, Nietzscheism, and a dozen more up-to-date philosophies; and I perceived that when his interest was aroused he did not especially object to my shadow falling across his own. After the first evening we were firm friends; on the second night he admitted, in fluent, eloquent English, that he was an agnostic. On the third he was sitting in our stateroom drinking gin.

"It looks like water—and it's always well to be on the safe side," he whispered, as we raised our glasses.

I don't know how it came about, but all at once I discovered that the venerable gentleman was as squalid a blackguard as I had ever had the fortune to meet. I suppose confidence begot confidence; anyhow, presently we three were hard at work upon the details of a scheme which was to enrich us all.

"Mind you," said the high priest, reassuming the discarded garment of virtue, "I am not a dishonest man. But why should these wretched idolaters possess such wealth, which has absolutely no meaning to them, when it could be used as I know we three shall use it"—here he winked portentously—"for the advancement of humanity?"

"And this statue—how is it called?" asked Nikolai.

"The Juggernaut," I interrupted. "Surely you have heard of it, Nikolai? They used to put human victims inside and burn them to the beating of tomtoms; and since the English government abolished the practice they take it through the streets of Calcutta annually and sacrifice a pig instead."

"This Rajah," interpolated the priest blandly, sipping at his gin and soda, "decorated it with rubies to the value of about eight millions of your dollars. There is an enormous ruby for either eye, and a bigger one still that hangs over the forehead. These three gems are worth about a million apiece. The smaller gems, aggregating five millions, are strung between the ears and over the breast. They can all be reached from the trap window in the throat by anyone inside. You enter through the back. I want the three big gems—and you can divide the smaller ones. Such a treasure converted into money will do much to spread the pure faith of the Vedas through Bengal," he added, with an unctuous smirk, "and the idolaters will never know that their jewels are Birmingham crystals and cost one shilling a gross." Here he pulled out a handful of what looked like magnificent rubies and threw them upon the table. Three were as large as pigeons' eggs.

Then the scoundrel unfolded his plan to us. It appeared that, as one of the highest order of Brahmin priests, he was in charge of the Juggernaut temple and of the priests who served the great idol. He would admit us to the temple, let us into the door at the rear of the figure, and leave us there to remove the splendid rubies from the eye-sockets and forehead and to put in their place the imitation stones, which he thereupon handed us. We should be able to reach every gem through a little opening in the throat, and must watch our opportunity during the night when we should be inside the idol. In the morning, while the priests were busy in the temple, he would approach us and receive the three largest stones through the trap door. The remainder were to be our property, and we would then be wheeled throuh the streets of Calcutta, inside the idol. When the portions of roast pig were thrust through the trap in the throat, we would dispose of them, thus incidentally establishing a new miracle for the Juggernaut; and finally, at night, when the idol was returned to his home, the priest would see that we had an opportunity to slip away before the interior was explored by the temple attendants, who usually appropriated the minor offerings of fruits and rice cast into the Juggernaut's maw.

"There is one essential condition though," said the high priest to Nikolai. "I must dress you as Hindoos and dye your skins."

We demurred to this, and the argument was an extended one. Finally we compromised. Our faces should be painted, not dyed, and our hands also; the rest of our bodies should be concealed under the robes of priests.

Nikolai and I agreed afterward that the project was fair enough.

"He can't betray us, or he will be caught with the rubies himself," he said to me. "And we can't betray him because we shall be at his mercy. 'Lord, Lord,' as Falstaff says, 'what a lot of wickedness there is in the world.'"

On the next morning we saw the Swami, as of course he called himself, promenading upon the deck in stately fashion between his two attendants, and as Nikolai and I approached he drew himself carefully apart, so that our shadows should not contaminate his purity, at the same time slightly but deliberately lowering his left eyelid. We understood the signal to mean that he desired no further communication with us in public. We saw little of him thereafter until the steamship put into the port of Calcutta, when Nikolai found a letter beside his plate at breakfast in which full instructions were given as to our actions.

We registered at an Eurasian hotel, frequented mainly by half-breed clerks in the government service—a place where everything was illicit, from the sale of liquor in a cubby-hole to the breakfast butter; and in consequence the patrons mutually respected each other's idiosyncrasies. It did not prove a difficult matter, therefore, for one of the Swami's satellites, who called for us the following morning, and addressed us in tolerable English, to array us in Indian costume, paint our hands and faces, and smuggle us out of the building into the native quarter. It is a peculiarity of India that, if everybody sees, nobody talks; a hundred keen native eyes must have recognized in the two amateur native priests of a subordinate grade two of the hated Feringhees, but not a curious look followed us as we followed the sacred bulls that strolled through the bazaar, helping themselves to fruit and grains from the stalls that they encountered. We resigned ourselves entirely to our guide. He quartered us in a native house and, after dark, led us to the temple enclosure, where we squatted humbly outside the Swami's magnificent palace, awaiting his pleasure.

"It goes against the grain," said I ruefully, as we waited there, with the chattering, servile herd of temple votaries.

"It's worth it," said Nikolai. "Even assuming that the high priest lied about the value of the rubies, as he probably did, there still must be a fortune for both of us." He picked up a handful of the false stones and scrutinized them ruefully. "Not much chance of passing off some of these upon him, even in the dark," he said "They wouldn't deceive a child."

Suddenly a shadow fell athwart us. Nikolai sprang to his feet; I followed suit; the Swami stood before us. But to our surprise he was not attired in the regalia of his office, but plainly enough, almost meanly, in his cotton shirt and breeches.

"I am doing penance," he explained in a low voice. "I let an English woman brush against the stall at which I sat. So I have to don penitential attire and vacate my quarters for a space. I am housed in a little better than a hut—but it abases pride," he continued, with his indescribable leer. "Come with me."

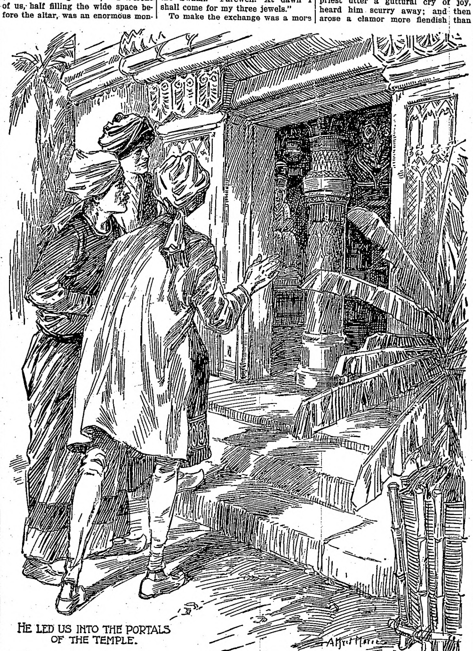
He led us into a rude shanty of wattle and daub, where we sat down to a substantial meal of meats, washed down with a bottle of extra dry champagne. I must confess that the brazen hypocrisy of the Swami revolted me: I preferred the type of rascal that Nikolai represented. We ate our meal in silence, while the Swami gave us our final instructions.

"I shall lead you direct to the Juggernaut," he said. "Listen! You hear that din? His votaries are commencing their orgies. They will keep that up all night, until morning, when the celebration begins; they will be mad with the intoxication of their fanaticism. The idol is housed in the great temple which you saw yonder. I shall lead you within; nobody will be there, for only priests of the highest rank may enter. I shall unlock the door and put you inside the idol. The interior is stuffy, but air comes through the trap door in the throat, and you will find a couple of stools and a water-skin. Tomorrow at dawn you will have the rubies ready for me. You will not then be able to escape, but must allow yourselves to be wheeled through the streets all day. Don't forget to eat the food offerings that are placed in the trap door; and if any foolish women cast in their rings, I trust you will make an equitable division with me. Above all else, do not let your heads appear above the opening of the trap. At night I will come back to the temple and release you. Now, if you are ready, gentlemen—"

Again that indescribable leer, but this time it was so menacing, and sinister and covert that for the first time a chill struck through me. For the first time I half repented our undertaking. I glanced at Nikolai, who correctly interpreted my look. As the Swami's attention was momentarily distracted he patted his pocket, and I understood that he, at least, was armed.

The change, when we went outside, was startling. The sun had set and, the moment that it disappeared beneath the horizen with the suddenness common to tropical countries, the light of day had gone. In an instant darkness had spread over Calcutta; the large stars were shining in the sky; and below, around the temple, with its fantastic architecture, wild, naked figures were leaping round a hundred fires, brandishing weapons and shrieking in accents that seemed hardly to emanate from human throats. But, as the Swami approached, these groups one after another darted away from him as though in mortal fear, and he led us into the portals of the temple.

Once within, I fairly caught my breath at the magnificence of the spectacle. Soft lights were burning from a hundred sconces; the air was fragrant with strange odors; and in front of us, half filling the wide space before the altar, was an enormous monster, a stout dragon with an elephant's trunk, eight human arms, and a hideously enlarged abdomen, that squatted upon a low, broad, eight-wheeled carriage.



HE LED US INTO THE PORTALS OF THE TEMPLE.

"Inside that bloated form," said the Swami, leering again, "they once stowed human sacrifices that the government has since put down. Are you afraid to enter?"

I hesitated. We were right beneath the monster now, and all at once the light from a lamp flashed full upon the scintillating, coruscating eyes. They were indeed two rubies, but larger than pigeons' eggs; and round the breast, and between the ears, and between the eyes, hung countless other gems.

"Come on!" cried Nikolai, stirred by the sight of the prospective plunder. He turned to the Swami. "What is to prevent us from taking the gems now, making our substitutions, and departing before we are discovered?" he asked.

"Every person who enters the temple is searched on leaving," the priest answered. "Even I am not exempt. It is a tradition dating from prehistoric times. Only, tomorrow night, when the miracle which you are to bring off regarding the eating of the sacrifice has stirred the people to frenzy, the rule may not be observed."

My doubt grew stronger. Surely no lamer reason was ever offered. Why, how simple it would be to substitute the jewels now and, secreting the rubies somehow upon our persons, to slip away. I disbelieved. One glance at the priest's leering face confirmed all my doubts, which, hitherto nameless, began to take horrible shape within my mind. I clutched Nikolai by the arm.

Then, when I looked into his face, I knew that his determination was unshakable. The sight of the gems had fascinated him. The priest and he were both against me. And then my eye fell upon the little bulge in his pocket where his pistol lay, and I yielded. We stepped behind the monster. The Swami drew a slender key from his gridle and unlocked the door. We stepped into a gloomy vault. The door clicked behind us and we were cooped up in our self-chosen prison. We heard the hoarse voice of the priest outside.

"Feel for the hinge of the trap door," he whispered. "Ah! That is right."

Nikolai had found the spring and let down a small aperture in the monster's throat, through which a little light came in. Now we could see that we stood in a little room about seven feet high and four by five in width. Above our heads we saw the vaulted roof of the temple, coruscating with colored lamps. Footstools were upon the floor. The walls were apparently of solid brass.

"Stretch forth your arm and feel the eyes," murmured the voice without.

I saw Nikolai's arm disappear through the trap.

"Good! You can reach them," said the Swami. "Farewell. At dawn I shall come for my three jewels."

To make the exchange was a more difficult matter than we had anticipated. In the first place, it took us some time to become acquainted with the form of the creature, since we were within and had to guide ourselves entirely by the sense of touch. After a half hour's work we had dislodged the eyes from their settings and drawn them within the interior. To replace them with the artificial stones was still more difficult. We were both exhausted with the tension when this had been done. However, the smaller jewels were merely strung upon wires between the ears and round the breast, and to replace these was easy. It must have been about midnight when we at last were in possession of our spoil.

"Nikolai," said I, "I do not trust that devil. How do we know he has not some malignant design against us? Let us see whether we cannot escape from the temple now—not to rob him of his share, but in self-defense."

"I fancy," said Nikolai, with a cynical laugh, "you will find that he has locked the door."

So events proved. Not only could we not open the aperture in the rear of the monster, but we could not even find it—so cunningly had it been wrought that no joint was perceptible to the touch.

"We must wait till day comes," said Nikolai at length. "I own I shall not be sorry to see the last of this business."

In truth our position was not a pleasant one. And, as for breaking our way out, we might as well have hammered against a wall of chiseled steel.

Dawn came at last, and with surprising suddenness. As the first ray of light pierced the aperture in the throat, the low murmur of the fanatics rose into yell, and, as if in concert, a troop of naked devotees came pouring into the temple. They seized the monster and harnessed themselves to him; then the thing lurched, jolted, swayed; and suddenly we saw the open sky above us.

They were dragging us through the streets of Calcutta; but our view extended only to the highest roofs and the tops of the trees.

It must have been a couple of hours later when we halted. And suddenly we heard the priest's voice beneath us.

"I could not come before," he whispered hurriedly. "Throw out the three largest gems—quick. The people are very fanatical. Drop them through the orifice. In six hours more all will be over and you shall be freed."

"If we hold them as a hostage for our safety—" Nikolai whispered. And all at once I realized that he was as unnerved as I. That devil without must have understood our hesitation.

"The people are very fanatical," he repeated. "If they knew that the Juggernaut is not empty, that the hated Feringhees—"

Nikolai dropped the rubies through the opening in the throat; I heard the priest utter a guttural cry of joy, heard him scurry away; and then arose a clamor more fiendish than any I had heard. Nikolai tiptoed toward the aperture and, raising himself, looked down. He beckoned to me and I followed him. The horror of what I saw wholly unnerved me. We were not in Calcutta but in a vast clearing in the midst of a jungle, and around us, stretching away on either side to the limits of the bush, were thousands of naked men, shrieking aloud with furious joy.

Even as I looked, a man rushed forward with an armful of wood and cast it in a heap at the idol's feet. A hideous roar went up in the pitiless sky. The sun, a burning ball in a vast sphere of blue, turned the brazen flanks of the monster to molten flames. Then from the middle of the seething crowd, troops of men ran forward, each carrying brushwood which they flung down until the pile rose almost to the aperture.

We knew now into what hideous trap we had fallen. We were the sacrifice, and all of them had known, known from the first moment that we set foot inside the temple doors. How could we have been so blind!

I screamed in an agony of fear, and my voice went bellowing out of the monster's throat like the roar of a bull. And instantly from every quarter a mocking roar arose in answer. Then a ruddy flame shot upward and I fell backward with Nikolai upon the brazen floor.

Frenzy seized us then and we beat and hammered upon the walls, which gave forth a clanging reverberation. It was growing warmer. Our feet were scorched, and streams of sweat poured from our bodies. The water in the skin, devilishly left there to prolong our agonies, had long since been exhausted. Now the sides of the monster were glowing hot. Our flesh was scorched; our clothes began to peel from our bodies. We were falling into a merciful insensibility. But suddenly the wild screams of the worshipers changed to shrill cries of terror; I heard the thunder of hoofs; with a last effort I flung myself against the door; it yielded, and I fell out into the arms of a mounted trooper, white as myself. I crouched at his feet, drawing in the fresh air, cooler than ice in comparison with the inferno, and fainted.

"You have both had a fortunate escape," said the magistrate next morning, when Nikolai and I awoke, bandaged and trussed, in cool beds placed on his veranda. Our hair had been cropped, our eyebrows and lashes had been singed to the roots. Another two minutes and we should have been too late to save you. Luckily the police traced you to that Eurasian hotel and were astute enough to track your route to the temple. It is three years since such an event occurred in India, but the old fanaticism is not dead, and every year, at Juggernaut time we are on the watch for similar occurrences. Happily one of the rogues has turned king's evidence, and we know all the circumstances."

"But the high priest—the Swami—" I gasped.

The magistrate smiled.

"That was no priest," he said. "Had you possessed any knowledge of Brahminism you would have known that the Brahmin priest is a mild and saintly man, incapable of such practices, and, above all, that the laws of his religion absolutely forbid him to cross the 'black water,' as they call the ocean. No true Brahmin priest has ever been, or ever will appear, beyond the seas.

"We know the fellow well, and, though he has escaped our clutches again, we hope soon to lay hands upon him. He is a man of the lowest caste and employed in many dubious devices. In this case he seems to have been hired to entrap a couple of Europeans or Americans for the secret sacrifice which those fanatics hoped to hold in their jungle."

He paused and smiled; then, going to a drawer, he took out a sealed package.

"Did he make any stipulation with you regarding rubies?" he asked.

I bowed my head in shame.

"Cheer up," said the magistrate blithely. "Better men than you have been taken in by the same device. All the jewels upon the Juggernaut were replaced by spurious gems about the time of the first century of the Christian era—except three treasured stones, the size of pigeons' eggs, which are closely guarded. Those three are in the eyes and upon the forehead. I see that they still remain in place upon the idol. Doubtless he forebore to speak to you about them. The stones which you removed were made in Birmingham, and placed there three years ago by the last victim—who did not come off as fortunately as you did."

"I did not tell him that the three real gems had at last followed the path of all the rest. But when I think of how we were doubly betrayed—how we offered our lives to enrich the pockets of the false Swami with three millions of dollars' worth of rubies—sometimes I still think that I will rake hell and earth to find him and have one little half hour with him alone.

VISIBLE AFTER MANY YEARS

Blaze Marks Made Nearly a Century and a Half Ago Offered in Evidence in Court.

Interesting testimony was brought out during the case in Amsterdam, N. Y., of Maggie Cook against Mary Wray, daughter of Colonel Mann, to recover lands in possession of three cottagers on Lake George valued at $60,000. The jury brought in a verdict in favor of the defendant, finding no cause for action.

The title which the defendant presented ran back to 1767 and carried two parcels of land. One was a grant by King George III. to a loyal sergeant of his army, William Frindt of Lake Champlain, and was for 200 acres. The other parcel consisted of 100 acres granted the same year to "two loyal private soldiers," Scott and Jackson.

There are cottages on these grants at the present time. Blocks of wood showing blazes which were on trees were shown at the trial. These blazes were made 146 years ago and time did not deface them, although the marking "W. F." had been washed from the surface of rocks by the waters from Lake George.

Crime and Novelettes.

It is the custom, particularly among magistrates, to attribute half the crimes of the metropolis to cheap novelettes. If some grimy urchin runs away with an apple the magistrate shrewdly points out that the child's knowledge that apples appease hunger is traceable to some curious literary researches. The boys themselves when penitent, frequently accuse the novelettes with great bitterness, which is only to be expected from young people possessed of no little native humor. If I had forged a will, and could obtain sympathy by tracing the incident to the influence of George Moore's novels, I should find the greatest entertainment in the diversion.—C. K. Chesterton.

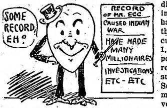
Recalling the Bloody War of the Broken Egg

WASHINGTON.—The subject of eggs came up at luncheon time in the senate restaurant. The proposition of efficient economy was under discussion when Senator Carroll S. Page made the startling statement that in the discussion of tariff and currency, one important element of cost and loss had been overlooked. He referred to the report from the secretary of agriculture, declared that in one year over 1,500,000 eggs were destroyed in transportation to New York city. This loss represented 9 per cent. of the total supply. With a twinkle in his eye, Senator Page suggested that some one might acquire fame and fortune by inventing a safe and sane egg-carrier that would avert the smashing of 10 per cent. of the eggs laid by the American hen. The farmer's boy of years ago can recall the time when eggs sold at from five to ten cents a dozen, and even under those conditions the smashing of an egg was a real calamity.



The omnipresent egg on the breakfast table recalls the story told by the late Senator Allison of a broken egg that led to an Indian war in Minnesota. In 1862, several Sioux Indians appeared in a farmer's dooryard and saw a nest of eggs with a hen sitting on it, as an industrious hen is wont to do. An Indian picked up one of the eggs, and his companions warned him not to break it as it belonged to a white man. Having a general contempt for all pale-faces, the brave could not resist smashing the egg. He proceeded to break the others in the nest, while another Sioux shot the hen, scared from her nest. A third Sioux, to show his heroism, sent a bullet through the farmer's cow, which brought the farmer to the door, rifle in hand; and a fourth Indian, to show his supreme bravery and his contempt for the white man, shot the farmer dead. This bloody outrage was completed by massacring the farmer's wife and children.

Thus from a bit of mischief started by a broken egg, there followed a revolt at the Indian reservation.

Chance Must Have Been a Little Too Caustic

REPRESENTATIVE ADAMSON wrote to M. O. Chance, chief clerk of the postoffice department, a little while ago in behalf of a clerk, A. E. Moody, a colored man from Georgia. He said to Mr. Chance that the clerk was a pretty good fellow, so "if he has done wrong don't discharge him, but cuss him out a bit."

?!
I THINK YOU ALL ARE GITTIN' KINDA STROPOLUS LIKE AIN'T YUH?

Well, in a few days along came a letter from Chance to Representative Adamson, saying that the cussing-out process must have been a little to caustic, for the clerk had resigned, leaving a letter informing Mr. Chance that a minister of the gospel had flown from their midst. This is the letter:

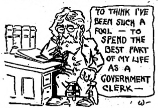
"Hon. Mr. Chance, Chief Clerk of the Postoffice Department.—Dear Sir: I do hereby send in my resignation to you. I truly hope that you will received it. Please your honor sir: I am a gospel minister. I have been called a long time ago to preach the gospel by the God of heaven and earth. I cannot do it successful and hold my job in the government services, and I will pray for the blessing of God to rest on the Postmaster General and his cabinet in the Post Office Department. But I may miss the envelope that is handed to me twice a month from the disbursing clerk, Mr. Mooney, but I rather missed that than to miss eternal life.

After which Representative Adamson wrote "Brother" Chance:

"I have your favor of the 4th instant, inclosing copy of a letter from Rev. Blank. I was not aware of the fact that he was a minister, nor do I know whether he has verified his call to the ministry or not. If he has correct advice in his credentials from on high you people in the postoffice department are in a bad fix."

Saddest Plaint One Ever Hears in Washington

WORKING for Uncle Sam, which at first is a vocation, oftentimes becomes a disease, and an incurable one. The saddest plaint one ever hears in Washington—sadder than the wail of the rejected office seeker—is that of the helpless and hopeless government clerk lamenting his unhappy lot. He realizes that he is "in bad," and yearns for one more chance to right himself. He is in the net and cannot escape. He would like to extricate himself, but that is impossible. Perhaps his head has whitened and his hands have palsied in the service, and his years of steady employment are unrepresented by a dollar saved. His fate is sealed. Gloomily he trods his weary way. Perhaps he is a man yet capable of throwing off his government harness and hitching himself to something better outside the cramping, grinding world of clerical slavery under official tryranny, but he has a family and cannot afford to take a chance.

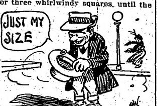


TO THINK I'VE BEEN SUCH A FOOL — TO SPEND THE BEST PART OF MY LIFE AS A GOVERNMENT CLERK —

He could fill satisfactorily most any position requiring clerical ability and experience, but he cannot let go his government job to find something even equally as remunerative. He is afraid to take the chance.—National Magazine.

As Everybody Knows, "Findings Is Keepings"

A FIERCE winter's wind went tangoing down the avenue the other day, with a derby hat dancing along. But it wasn't a "hesitation" dance. It romped and danced and rolled onward for three whirlwindy squares, until the man who had been sprinting after it gave up the chase.



And as he gasped and wheezed—red and wind blown—this is what a batch of fellow men heard him yell—every last man of them chuckling at the poor chap—which is the way of man, except when he's chasing a hat of his own:

"You can keep it up to Jericho, if you want to. I'm done—you unholy roller, you." He shook himself with the disgusted emphasis which dear Darwin could have told him he had inherited from some prehistoric web hen, and then turned and plodded back.

The hat, however, had no notion of taking a trip to Jericho. It stopped the instant its owner turned, and slid into a sheltered curb ledge, where it lay until another man came along and picked it up.

He was undoubtedly an honest man, for he looked about for a claimant, but the owner was already merged in the crowd, and, as everybody knows, findings is keepings.

The man brushed the hat with his sleeve, saw that it was an almost new derby, with the latest kink in ribbon bands, and—judging by his grin, as he looked inside—just his own size.

That's all, only do you suppose a hat could possibly absorb from the brains of its wearer such a thing as humor—of the satanic brand?

JOSEPH C. S. BLACKBURN

Joseph C. S. Blackburn of Kentucky, who was recently appointed to succeed former Senator Shelby M. Cullom of Illinois as the resident commissioner in charge of the construction of the Lincoln memorial in Washington, is one of the best story tellers in the country.

Speaking of the penchant of politicians to hold office once the germ gets into the blood, Mr. Blackburn told one of "Private John" Allen's stories recently to illustrate his point. Allen of Tupelo, Miss., was one of the historic wits of congress. A number of years ago Allen went to visit the plantation of his grandfather and rising early in the morning went out into the garden, where he found "Aunt Betsy," a negro servant of his grandfather, whereupon the following conversation took place:

"Marse John, ebery time I sees you I kyan't help thinking how much yuh looks like yuh ole grandfahtah. Yuh looks like him, yuh talks like him and yuh walks like him."

"Well, Aunt Betsy, what office did he ever hold?" inquired Allen.

"Jes' de same office you hold, Marse John," replied Aunt Betsy. "As long as Ah kin disremember, he was a candidate."

REPRESENTATIVE HUMPHREY'S FIRST CASE

When Representative W. E. Humphrey of the First district of Washington isn't in congress he practices law for a living—but he has been in congress for 11 years. However, he spent long years at the bar, but they and the subsequent service in congress, have failed to dim the recollection of his first case. He doesn't tell it; one has to get Mrs. Humphrey to do that. Here it is:

It was back in Indiana, the state of the nativity of most far western statesmen, where they breed politicians as Massachusetts breeds highbrows. Mr. Humphrey had just hung out his shingle when he was retained in a small case before a county justice of the peace.

This justice was an old friend. Mr. Humphrey and he had sat on the same bench in country school and gone swimming together in the ol' swimming hole.

"Will," said the justice, seeking him out privately, "this is the first case I ever tried as justice, and I don't know a blamed thing about law. You've just got to help me out. See?"

The young advocate saw. And so, through the trial, he hammered vigorously, mostly on the table. But when he hammered on the book he got the ruling. The score at the end stood: Rulings against Humphrey, 12; rulings in favor of Humphrey, 5; percentage against Humphrey, .294. Nevertheless, Humphrey won.

TREADWAY'S WASTED ENERGY

© HARRIS & EWING

"I think I'm rightfully entitled to the presidency of the Wasted Energy club," remarked Representative Allen Treadway of Massachusetts at Washington, the other day. "In closing my campaign last fall with a tour through my district I sallied forth gayly one morning, after telephoning my lieutenants at the town of B—— that I would arrive there punctually at three o'clock that afternoon to deliver an address.

"An hour later, as my car topped a hill, I saw a most charming valley stretched off to my right. Turning down into it I commenced my electioneering work.

"Never had I met such genial folk. Every one seemed ready to listen to me with a smile as soon as I made known my mission. Charmed with this reception, I forgot the flight of time until I suddenly found it was after four o'clock and I was a dozen miles from B——.

"When I chugged into it I found the remnants of a reception committee awaiting me.

"'I'm late, boys,' I said, cheerfully, 'but I've done a capital day's work back in the country here.'

"'Have you been electioneering up that road you just came down?' inquired the committee spokesman in sour tones.

"'Yes,' I replied, 'and I've got that section solid. Every man of them promised that, at least, he would not vote against me.'

"'I guess not!' rasped the spokesman. 'You've been electioneering all day across the state line over in Vermont.'"

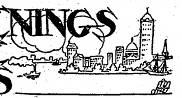
MRS. MORRIS SHEPPARD OF TEXAS

The woman in public life who remains enthusiastic and unwearied throughout a Washington season, with its round of official and private entertaining, is rare. The woman who not only accomplishes this feat, but who finds time to read with her husband the good old books that a certain Mr. Dickens, a Mr. Thackeray and other gentlemen of their time used to write, is a paragon. She has achieved both poise and a sense of leisure.

One finds on the library table of Mrs. Morris Sheppard, the young wife of Senator Sheppard of Texas, not only these standard works of fiction that show she treads the conventional and well worn paths of literature. Besides these, there is always some rarer volume at hand, such, for instance, as an "Autobiography of Benevuto Cellini," or it may be, an exquisite brochure by some little known, little read author, which proves its owner and reader to be a connoisseur of books.

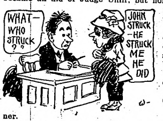
"My husband and I," says Mrs. Sheppard, "are fond of society, but we do not allow it to interfere with our favorite recreation, that of reading together.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES



Whole Deal Struck This Clerk as Real Funny

CHICAGO.—Warrant Clerk John J. Gardner of the court of domestic relations has ministered to the troubles of thousands of married couples since he became an aid of Judge Uhlir, but none of the misunderstandings were as momentous as one which confronted the clerk the other day.



WHAT— WHO STRUCK ??
JOHN STRUCK —HE STRUCK ME HE DID

Gardner was dreaming about the opening baseball game when he was disturbed by the appearance of a woman who wanted a warrant for her husband's arrest.

"What's your name?" queried the clerk, mechanically.

"Mary Struck, and I live at 216 East Ontario street," answered the woman.

"What's the charge?" asked Gardner.

"He struck me," replied the woman, angrily.

"Who struck you?" demanded Gardner, who is used to hearing such complaints.

"John Struck," snapped the woman.

Gardner appeared peeved.

"Sure, John struck you," he said, "but there are a lot of Johns in this city. Who is he?"

"He's Struck," the woman attempted to explain.

"He's Struck," said Gardner. "Well, who struck him? What is this, a free-for-all fight?"

"Pay attention," she demanded. "My husband, John Struck—that's his name—struck me, Mary Struck—that's my name. Can't you understand English!"

A light burst upon Gardner, and he made out a warrant for Mary Struck, against her husband, John Struck, 1645 North Wood street, charging that he struck her.

It was very simple after an explanation.

Glove Counter Fussed Up When Actor Comes In

PITTSBURGH, PA.—He was an actor; if proof of identity were needed, the astrachan-collared topcoat and silver-headed walking stick (summer weight) were sufficient. As he breezed up to the ladies' glove counter in a downtown department store a blonde fairy sporting an aquiline nasal appendage recognized him.

Thud! Instantly business at the glove counter was at a standstill.

"Hey, girls," piped up the blonde with the noticeable nose; "pipe that guy that Mazie's waitin' on. He's a actor and plays in the stock company. Me'n Myrtle Harlin seen him play a swell part las' week. I guess he ain't workin' this week. Gee, ain't he a swell looker, though?" Like an ignited powder train this startling information spread throughout the department.

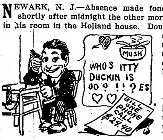
Selecting a pair of lady's white kid gloves, the actor ordered them wrapped for mailing and then tendered a bill in payment.

But this wasn't all. There was change forthcoming; and when the hero had departed, one of the stricken ones had courage to ask Mazie what priced gloves had been purchased.

"Oh, he ain't nothin' but a cheap skate. He got a pair of them 79-cent things and told me to take all the cost marks off."

Cupid's Tolls Remain Unpaid; Talker in a Cell

NEWARK, N. J.—Absence made fonder the heart of Douglas Whittaker shortly after midnight the other morning as he wrestled with sleeplessness in his room in the Holland house. Douglas, who is eighteen and lives, when at home, in Winthrop, Mass., was thinking of a fair person in his home town and decided that the only way he could overcome his restlessness would be to call her on the telephone.



He made the call from his room.

The clerk, whose eye was on the white tab in the switchboard, at length grew weary and sent a bellboy up to ask Douglas if he expected to terminate the conversation before Washington's birthday.

"Tell him I'll be finished in a minute," said Douglas. In time he hung up the receiver and walked down to the hotel office. "How much?" he asked the clerk.

"Oh, I guess a dollar'll cover it," was the answer, "but I might as well ask central."

"That's a good idea," said Mr. Whittaker.

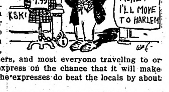
It wasn't such a good idea—for Mr. Whittaker—as the operator announced that he had been talking for one hour and three minutes, the charge for which was $24.40."

"Gee," Douglas whistled. "I haven't got over 51 cents. You'll have to take that."

"Who put that foolish idea into your head?" the clerk asked. He sent for a policeman, and Douglass was arrested.

Part the Bronx Plays in Greater New York City

NEW YORK.—Greater New York consists of five boroughs. And if you should manage to squeeze into a Bronx express in the subway you probably would conclude that all of New York's millions live in the Borough of Bronx and only go to the other boroughs on business or for social purposes.



$4.99
KSK!
WHEN I GET A LITTLE MORE MONEY I'LL MOVE TO HARLEM

There are several ways of reaching the Bronx, but the most unpopular route is via the subway. Both local and express trains run to the Bronx. The local trains stop at every station on the way and take about an hour in transit. The express trains stop between stations and take about an hour and a half. But, as was stated, New Yorkers are natural born gamblers, and most everyone traveling to or from the Bronx tries to get into an express on the chance that it will make better time than a local. Sometimes the expresses do beat the locals by about two minutes.

People who reside in the Bronx sometimes move to Harlem. In the social climb, the route begins, for example, in a clothing store in the East side, where push-cart markets decorate the streets. From the lower East side the prosperous retail merchant moves to the Bronx. He has thus elevated his social status. When he becomes sufficiently wealthy for his daughters to resign their positions in the department stores where they sell ribbons, and for his sons to attend the City College of New York instead of continuing their study of the tailoring trade, he moves to Harlem, and the family craft is launched upon the social sea.

BODY OF VERGARA IS BROUGHT TO U. S.

MYSTERY SURROUNDS SECURING OF TEXAS RANCHMAN'S REMAINS.

CORPSE INDICATES TORTURE

Fingers of Left Hand Charred and Skull Crushed as Though By Rifle Butt—Rangers Didn't Return Body.

Laredo, Tex., March 10.—The mutilated body of Clemente Vergara, the Texas ranchman lured into Mexico by Mexican federal soldiers, was secretly brought to the American side of the Rio Grande river early Sunday by a mysterious party of men.

No Trace of Identity.

Departing as silently as they had crossed the river, the men who disinterred the body from the Hidalgo, Mex., cemetery and bore it five miles over a rough trail to American territory, left no trace of their identity.

Their act definitely established that Vergara was executed after his capture. He had been shot twice through the head and once through the neck. His skull was crushed as though by a rifle butt, and the fingers of his left hand were charred.

This last circumstance is taken to indicate that the rancher was tortured before he was killed.

But Two Notified.

American Consul Garrett of Nuevo Laredo, Mex., and Captain J. J. Saunders of the Texas rangers, were the only persons on the American side who were told of the intended delivery of the body at the border. They went to the scene, 45 miles up the river from Laredo, found the body as they had been told they would, and had it brought back to Laredo, pending an examination the state will have made.

None of the officials would make a statement except to set at rest earlier reports that Texas rangers and friends of Vergara had acted together in crossing into Mexico and obtaining the body for burial by the family.

Rumors had it that former employes of the Vergara ranch were responsible for the recovery of the body.

Consul Makes Statement.

Consul Garett also forestalled surmises that the Mexican authorities might have taken this means to return the body by saying that he did not believe they knew the body had been removed. He had never asked nor received any authority from them to return the body to Texas, he said.

Apparently the only clew to the identity of the men was a shovel left in the open grave in the Hidalgo cemetery. To it was attached a card inscribed: "Recuerdos" — "Remembrances."

Location of the grave proved an easy task, for it has been a center of speculation since it appeared after a swinging body had been cut down from the place of execution, when the hue and cry of Vergara's disappearance started an investigation. The body had been rudely interred with little effort to protect it from the earth.

History of Case.

Vergara left his ranch, near Halafox, Texas, Friday, Feb. 13, and crossed the river into Mexico on a message from three Federal soldiers that Captain Apolino Rodriguez of the Hidalgo garrison wished to settle for 11 horses taken from Vergara's island pasture in the Rio Grande.

Mrs. Vergara pleaded with her husband not to risk seizure by the Mexicans, but disregarded her warnings. He crossed the river in company with his young nephew. Mrs. Vergara since has told how she saw her husband assaulted by the waiting soldiers and, after being knocked unconscious, carried off.

Not Rangers, Says Governor.

Austin, Texas.—After a long distance telephone conversation with Captain J. J. Sanders of the Texas rangers, Governor Colquitt of Texas declared the actual recovery of the body of Clemente Vergara, American ranchman, was not made by Texas rangers, but that the body was taken from the Hildago, Mex., cemetery and brought to the border by other persons. Who these persons were it was said, the ranger captain did not know.

This statement injected an element of mystery in the affair in view of the statement credited to Sanders earlier in the night that he had "proceeded to Hidalgo and secured Vergara's body."

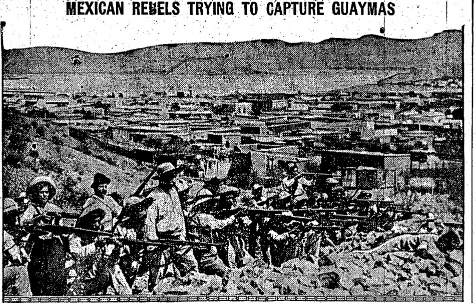
Death Wins 6,000-Mile Race.

Kansas City, Mo., March 9.—Death was the victor in a 6,000-mile race which ended when Miss Mary Peters arrived here from Paris, thirty minutes after her mother died.

Arkansas Girl's Hair Clipped.

Altus, Ark., March 10.—Verna Droll, a pretty 17-year-old girl, was attacked by a stranger here in the shadow of her home and her hair clipped off with a huge pair of shears. Her clothing was cut and she was injured severely by rocks the man threw at her when she escaped. Posses are scouring the countryside in search of the assailant. The most plausible theory advanced is that the attack was instigated by some one who had a grudge against the family.

MEXICAN REBELS TRYING TO CAPTURE GUAYMAS



Since the beginning of the war on Huerta, Guaymas has been one of the strategic points in the Mexican republic. The rebels have surrounded and repeatedly attacked it, but have failed to dislodge the federal garrison under General Ojeda.

SUCCESSOR TO MOORE SOUGHT

LIND, HALE AND WHITE BEING MENTIONED.

Question of Filling Vacant Position of Counselor in State Department Puzzles Wilson.

Washington, March 7. — Wanted —The best authority on international law and the best lawyer obtainable for the positions of counsellor and solicitor, respectively, in the state department.

This was the word which came from the White House with the information, too, that President Wilson seeks the most efficient men for these places, irrespective of their political affiliations. For the post of counsellor vacated by John Bassett Moore, the president realizes that he will have a difficult task in finding another such authority on international questions.

He hopes, however, to get an experienced international law expert, who has had broad diplomatic training as well. The names of W. W. Rockhill, former ambassador to Turkey and Russia, who was recently mentioned for the position of diplomatic adviser to the president of China, was prominent in the discussion. Henry White, former ambassador to France, also was mentioned; as were William Bayard Hale and John Lind, who have been unofficial representatives of the president in Mexican affairs.

For the position of solicitor, which requires adaptation to the legal affairs of the state department, the claims made on the United States government and matters relating to extradition, there were few names discussed. Members of congress are expected to make recommendations shortly for both positions.

HOLD-UP MEN GET $10,165

Paymaster of St. Louis Shoe Factory Robbed at Door of Concern.

St. Louis, Mo., March 9.—Two robbers, armed with revolvers, held up John Lucas, paymaster of the Brown Shoe company here, and robbed him of $10,165.

The robbery took place in front of a factory and branch office of the company.

After getting the money the bandits leaped into Lucas' automobile and escaped. Pointing their revolvers at the chauffeur they commanded him to drive east and north. There they left the automobile and took a street car bound for the northern limits of the city.

Paymaster Lucas and another employe of the shoe company went to a bank and drew the money with which to pay the factory employes. Later they went in an automobile to a side entrance of the factory, stepped from the car and turned to take the two valises containing the money from the automobile. It was at this juncture, while their backs were turned to the sidewalk, that the two men who had been standing near the factory door rushed toward them and covered them with revolvers.

"Coffin Trust" Is Defeated.

Macon, Mo., March 9. — Arlington Simpsch, 72 years old, was buried at Callao, Mo., in a coffin made of walnut lumber, cut and prepared by his own hands. Simpson, who died Saturday at his farm near here, made preparations for his funeral months ago, getting ready the materials for his casket and arranging for its manufacture, in order, he said, "to defeat the coffin trust."

St. Louis-Gulf Boat Soon.

St. Louis, Mo., March 7.—Through water route service on the Mississippi river between St. Louis and New Orleans will be inaugurated on March 15, when a self-propelled steel barge will leave the latter city for St. Louis. The trip will occupy eight or nine days. Stops will be made at the principal cities. The down stream trip will take about six days. Additional barges will be put into service as fast as traffic develops, it was announced [illegible]

INCOME TAX WILL YIELD $50,000,000

NEW LAW WILL PRODUCE REVENUE THAT ADVOCATES PREDICTED.

AFFECTED 425,000 PERSONS

Annual Revenue in Round Figures to Be Paid by Approximately That Number—Incorporation Tax, $35,000,000.

Washington, March 9.—The income tax law bids fair to live up to the expectations of the administration by producing about $50,000,000 annually in revenue paid by about 425,000 individuals.

More Than 400,000 Pay.

Although treasury officials decided not to make public for the present the reports of internal revenue collectors on the income tax, it became known that more than 400,000 individuals had made returns in the 63 collection districts up to Monday midnight, when the time limit expired.

From these individuals it was understood that the government probably would collect more than $40,000,000.

It has been the opinion among officials that thousands of individuals would take advantage of the 30 days' extension of time granted in case of absence and sickness and they expect the final figures to show at least 25,000 more reporting than were given in the preliminary lists from collectors.

Close to Estimates.

If they are not mistaken in this view the actual results will be close to the estimates made at the time the legislation was before congress.

This additional number, officials are inclined to believe, will not only include the number subject to the tax, but the amount to be collected.

Including the incorporation tax, as amended in the present law, it was estimated that the annual revenue from this source would amount to about $85,000,000.

TANGO NO DANCE, SAYS DEAN

Episcopal Minister Asserts There Is No Rhythm in the New "Fad."

Spokane, Wash., March 9. — Very Rev. W. C. Hicks, dean of All Saints Episcopal cathedral, has barred the dancing of the tango in his parish. The current issue of the cathedral paper contains prohibition against the tango, but gives his approval of the hesitation waltz and one-step.

The dean, in his announcement, says:

"Two young people interlocking knees and putting their chests together and then pushing each other across the floor with a duck-like walk are not dancing and until society can become sane and return to those dances which express true rhythm, no dance where an admission fee is charged can be given by any society of the Cathedral parish."

Edward H. McBride Dead.

Buffalo, N. Y., March 7.—Edward H. McBride, 42 years old, widely known as a sporting writer under the name of "Hotspur," died here following an operation for a throat infection.

Aiding Unemployed Army.

San Francisco, March 9. — "Pass them along," is the plan on which California communities are dealing with "General" Kelley's army of unemployed, now on its way to Washington and as a result the tourists are traveling in state. STEPS TO REPEAL TOLL ACT

SIMS EXEMPTION BILL IS FAVORABLY REPORTED.

Canal Tolls Measure to Be Introduced in House Immediately— Senate Committee Busy.

Washington, March 9.—Initial steps to repeal the toll exemption clause of the Panama canal act as requested by President Wilson were taken in congress when the house committee on interstate commerce favorably reported a bill to strike out the provision.

In the senate the committee on interoceanic canals decided to meet immediately to consider the appeal of the president for a reversal of policy in the controversy which involves the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and, in the opinion of the president, the general foreign relations policy of the administration.

While the house is debating the issue the senate committee will consider what course to pursue, whether to recommend a flat repeal bill or to urge the compromise bill offered by Senator Chilton of West Virginia, a member of the committee, that would authorize the president to regulate tolls and assess charges at his discretion, wherever exemption is provided in the canal act.

"I believe that more senators would vote for my amendment than will support a flat repeal measure," said Senator Chilton last night. "Though the amendment would accomplish repeal of toll exemption indirectly it would not repudiate the Democratic platform plank indorsing toll exemption and senators who flatly refuse to go back on that plank could vote for it.'

In the house there was quick response to the president's address, the committee voting 13 to 3 to favorably report the Sims repeal bill. Absent members who were recorded made the vote 17 to 4. Chairman Adamson had ready a draft of the report when the committee met. It based approval of the Sims bill on the same two broad grounds set forth in the president's message—international general comity and the immediate foreign situation confronting the country.

Representative Knowland of California, who led the opposition in the committee, was given three days to file a minority report.

ELLIS GETS BUT 15 YEARS

Attorney for Wife Slayer Regards Verdict as Victory for Defense.

Chicago, March 7.—William Cheney Ellis was found guilty of murdering his wife, Mrs. Eleanor Hozen Ellis, last October in a Chicago hotel. Punishment was fixed at imprisonment in the state penitentiary for 15 years.

George Remus, Ellis' counsel, said the verdict was a complete victory for the defense and indicated he would not press a motion for a new trial, which was filed immediately after the verdict was read.

"If the new trial is denied," he said, "Ellis probably will be taken to the penitentiary to begin his servitude without making an appeal."

Big Policemen Tango in Court.

Lowell, Mass., March 9.—Two heavyweight policemen tangoed in police court to prove to Judge Enright that the dance is immodest. The demonstration was given during the trial of Angeline Marcotte and Frank Hennessy, who are charged with improper dancing at Lincoln hall on Feb. 19. The judge reserved decision.

Prison Reform The Topic.

New York, March 6.—Leaders in the reform of prisons and other correctional institutions from almost every state in the union gathered here today to discuss the countrywide movement to treat convicts with more humanity and science. The conference is under the auspices of the metropolitan section of the woman's department of the National Civic federation.

Dr. Katherine B. Davis, New York City's commissioner of correction, was one of the speakers at the first session, held in the Hotel Astor.

SERIOUS CHARGES AGAINST RAILROAD

IRREGULAR ACCOUNTING IS ALLEGED BY CHICAGO, ST. PAUL AND MILWAUKEE.

PUBLIC MISLED, IT IS SAID

Unlawful Overstatement and Manipulation is Principal Offense—No Reflections on the Real Value.

Washington, March 9. — Charges that the book accounts of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railway company and of its subsidiary, the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound railway company, have been so manipulated as to mislead the public and tend to create a more favorable market for the securities of the roads, were contained in a report just made public by the interstate commerce commission after exhaustive investigation of the financial affairs of the roads.

Various Overstatements.

Various instances of unlawful overstatement of income were cited. While criticizing and condemning the accounting methods followed by the company, however, Commissioner Harlan, who prepared the report, said:

"We do not mean to be understood by anything here said as intimating that the St. Paul company is not a valuable property and is not achieving the results reasonably anticipated from the extension of its line to the Pacific coast."

Regarded Indefensible.

The disclosures by the investigation of what Commissioner Harlan describes the report as "serious irregularities" in the accounting system of the roads were regarded by the commission as indefensible, although the officers of the St. Paul company explained that they "resulted from negligence, inattention and a lack of familiarity on the part of the companies' comptroller and those under him with requirements of the commission."

"There is no sufficient basis of record," the commissioners' report says, "to enable us to condemn or acquit the comptroller, either of full responsibility or his share of responsibility for the condition of the accounts of these companies; but there are grounds for thinking that his responsibility was very materially qualified and minimized by the instructions and directions given him by the executives and other officials. Whatever may be the fact in that regard the commission now feels that a more careful observation of our rules and regulations is promised for the future. This we confidently anticipated would be realized."

Strict Accountability.

A general admonition contained in the report made it clear that the commission hereafter will hold to strict accountability all common carriers for the accuracy and truthfulness of the statements contained in their reports of financial operations.

In some instances, the report explained "a financially strong road making large net earnings would not hesitate to conceal the fact by adding to its operating expense accounts sums disbursed in improving its property; on the other hand, a financially weak road, seeking to enhance its credit by a good showing of operating results, would include in its property accounts sums expended in operation.

"The result was that a carrier's annual and monthly statements of net revenue often reflected nothing more than the particular showing desired by its report. These reports were often used for speculative purposes and stockholders and the general public were left without any assurance as to whether the dividends declared were paid from income or surplus or out of capital.

A Violation Cited.

"Under the accounting rules of the commission, the St. Paul company was permitted to include in its accounts a proper revenue for transportation of men and material, rents for equipment and other of its equipment used in the construction of the Puget Sound, and on funds advanced. That course, however, was not pursued. On the contrary, the St. Paul company included in its report accounts for the year 1910 all the interest, rents and revenues assignable to the period prior to July 1, 1909, the sum total amounting to over $4,600,000. In the same year it also decreased its operating expense accounts by crediting thereto more than $500,000 on account of the salvage of cars destroyed previous to the year 1907.

"By means of these entries the income of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway company for the year 1910 was overstated by more than $5,000,000. As a result of this overstatement of income the report of the St. Paul company for the succeeding year showed an apparent falling off in revenue and income of over $2,000,000. In its report to its stockholders of the company was the statement that "the large decrease in the net operating revenue is accounted for by the inability to obtain increased rates and the great increase in the cost of labor."

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The boy becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis' son while the former goes to America. The Marquis asks Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her lackeys. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill, in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis' brother Francois lures the Austrians from the hotel allowing the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years, in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants, and through him sends word to his friends of his plight. The general, Alixe and Pietro plans Francois' escape. Francois receives a note from Pietro explaining in detail how to escape from his prison. Alixe awaits him on horseback and leads him to his friends on board the American sailing vessel, the "Lovely Lucy." Francois, as a guest of Harry Hampton, on the "Lovely Lucy," goes to America to manage Pietro's estate in Virginia. Lucy Hampton falls in love with Francois. Prince Louis Napoleon in America becomes the guest of the Hamptons, where he meets Francois. Lucy Hampton reveals her love for Francois after the latter saves the life of Harry Hampton and is himself injured in the effort.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Finest Things.

Endurance, Francois' own negro boy, brought a note to Roanoke house on a morning five days after. It read:

"My Dear Miss Hampton:

"The doctor has given me permission to ride tomorrow and I wish to ride to Roanoke house before all other places. Will mademoiselle see me? Will mademoiselle permit me to see her for a short time alone? I await anxiously a word from you, and I am your servant,

"FRANCOIS BEAUPRE."

Mademoiselle sent a fair sheet of paper with a few unsteady scratches across it, and sat down to live over it was accomplished. The colonel had ridden to Norfolk for the day—had Francois known of that, one wonders? Lucy, waiting in that small stately study with the dim portraits and the wide vague view across the fields of the James river, heard the gay hoof beats of Aquarelle pound down the gravel under the window, heard Francois' deep gentle voice as he gave the horse to Sambo, and waited one minute more, the hardest minute of all. Then the door had opened and he stood there—the miracle, as it seems at such moments to a woman, possibly to a man—of all the gifts and qualities worth loving.

He had made his precise bow, and she had heard his voice saying gently: "Good morning, mademoiselle," and the door was closed; and they were alone together. In a flash she felt that it could not be endured, that she must escape. She rose hastily.

"I'm sorry I must go; I cannot stay—"

But Francois had laughed and taken her hand and was holding it with a tender force which thrilled her. He understood. She knew he understood the shame and fear of a woman who has given love unasked; she was safe in his hands; she knew that. With a sigh she let her fingers rest in his and sat down again and waited.

"Dear Mademoiselle Lucy," said the deep kind voice, "my first friend in Virginia, my comrade, my little scholar—"

Why did Lucy grow cold and quiet at these words of gentleness? Francois was sitting beside her, holding her hand in both his, gazing at her with the clearest affection in his look. Yet she braced herself against she did not know what. The voice went on with its winning foreign inflections, its slip of English now and then, and its never-to-be-described power of reaching the heart.

"See, mademoiselle," said Francois, "we are too real friends, you and I, to have deception between us. We will not pretend, you and I, to each other—is it not, mademoiselle? Therefore I shall not try to hide from you that I heard that day those words so wonderful which you spoke to me so unworthy. I have thought of those words ever since, mademoiselle, as I lay ill with this troublesome arm; ever since—all the time. My heart has been full of a—gratification to you which cannot be told. I shall remember all my life; I shall be honored as no king could honor me, by those words. And because you have so touched me, and have so laid that little hand on the heart of me, I am going to tell you, my dear comrade and scholar, what is most secret and most sacred to me."

In as few words as might be, he told her of the peasant child who had been lifted out of his poverty-bound life with such large kindliness that no bond which held him to that poor, yet dear life had been broken; who had been left all the love of his first home and yet been given a home and a training and an education which set him ready for any career; he told of the big-souled, blunt, Napoleonic officer, the seigneur; of the gray, red-roofed castle, with its four round towers; of handsome silent Pietro, and of the unfailing long kindness of them all. Then, his voice lowered, holding the girl's hand still, he told her of Alixe, of the fairy child who had met him on that day of his first visit and had brought him to her father, the seigneur. He described a little the playmate of his childhood, fearless, boyish in her intrepid courage, yet always exquisitely a girl. He told of the long summer vacations of the three as they grew up, and the rides in the Jura valley, and of that last ride when he knew that he was to go to Italy next morning, and of how he had faced the seigneur and told him that he loved his daughter and had given her up then, instantly, for loyalty to him and to Pietro. And then he told her of the peasant boy in Riders' Hollow in the gray morning light after the night of his escape—and how, by hand on the bridle and seat in the saddle, and at last by the long curl of the black lashes he had known the peasant boy for Alixe.

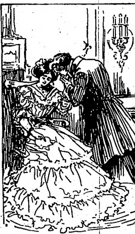
Lucy Hampton, listening, was so thrilled with this romance of a lifelong love that she could silence her aching heart and her aching pride and could be—with a painful sick effort—but yet could be, utterly generous. There is no midway in a case between entire selfishness and entire selflessness. The young southern girl, wounded, shamed, cruelly hurt in vanity and in love, was able to choose the larger way, and taking it, felt that sharp joy of renunciation which is as keen and difficult to breathe and as sweet in the breathing as the air of a mountaintop. Trembling, she put her other little hand on Francois' hands.

"I see," she said, and her voice shook and she smiled mistily, but very kindly. "You could not love anyone but that beautiful Alixe. I—I would not have you."

And Francois bent hastily, with tears in his eyes, and kissed the warm little hands. The uncertain sliding voice went on:

"I am not—ashamed—that I said that—to you. I would not have said it—not for worlds. I—thought you were killed." I—didn't know what I said. But I am not ashamed. I am glad that I—am enough of a person to have known—the finest things—and" —her voice sank and she whispered the next words over the dark head bent on her hands—"and to have loved them. But don't bother. I shall—get over it."

The liquid tones choked a bit on that and Francois lifted his head quickly and his eyes flamed at her: "Of course you will, my dear little girl, my brave mademoiselle. It is not as you think; it is not serious, mon amie. It is only that your soul is full of kindness and enthusiasm and eagerness to stand by the unlucky. I am alone and expatriated; I have had a little of misfortune and you are sorry for me. It is that. Ah, I know. I am very old and wise, me. It would never do," he went on. "The noblesse of Virginia would rise in a revolution if it should be that the princess of Roanoke house gave her heart to a French peasant. I am come to be a man of knowledge—" And he shook his head with as worldly-wise an expression as if one of Guido Reni's dark angels should talk politics. He went on again, smiling a little, an air of daring in his manner. "Moreover, Mademoiselle Miss Lucy, there is a fairy prince who awaits only the smallest sign from you."



He Bent Over Her Hand.

Lucy smiled. "No," she said. And then, "A fairy prince—in Virginia?"

"Ah, yes, Mademoiselle Miss Lucy. Of the true noblesse, that one. A fine, big, handsome prince, the right sort."

"Who?" demanded Lucy, smiling still.

"Of such a right sort indeed that it is no matter—ah, no, but perhaps just the thing to make one love him more, that he is lame."

"Harry!" Lucy's smile faded.

"But yes, indeed, mon amie," and Francois patted the little hand with his big one. "Henry, indeed. Henry, who is waiting to kill me for love of you; Henry, the best truest fellow, the manliest bravest fellow. Who rides like Henry? Who has read all the books in all the libraries like Henry? Who is respected by the old men, the great men, for his knowledge and his thinking and his statecraft almost—like Henry? Who has such a great heart and brain and such fearless courage as Henry?"

"You are very loyal to your friends," Lucy said, half pleased, half stabbed to the soul.

"Certainly. What for is gratification worth, otherwise?" Francois threw at her earnestly. There were a few English words too much for him still; "gratitude" seemed to be one. He stood up and his great eyes glowed down at her. "Mademoiselle," he said, "two women of earth, my mother and Alixe, are for me the Madonnas, the crown of women," and his glance lifted to the ceiling as if to heaven, without pose, unconscious—a look no American could ever have worn. "And, voila, mademoiselle, my little scholar will always stand next to and close to them." He bent over her hand and his lips touched it long and tenderly. "Is it right between us, mon amie? Are we friends always? It is indeed so for life with me."

And little Lucy felt a healing peace settling on her bruised feelings and heard herself saying generous words of friendship which healed also as she spoke them.

Then, "I must find that savage boy Henry, and beseech him to spare my life," spoke Francois at last. "My life is of more value today, that it possesses a sure friend in Mademoiselle Lucy," he said and smiled radiantly. And was gone.

"He said—that Harry loved me! What nonsense!" Lucy whispered to herself. And the broken-hearted one was smiling.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Once More at Home.

In fewer words, with less told, Francois' straightforwardness metamorphosed the angry lad Harry Hampton into a follower more devoted than he had been even in the first flush of enthusiasm for his rescued prisoner. Again the boy dogged his footsteps and adored him frankly. And Francois, enchanted to be friends again with his friend, wondered at the goodness and generosity of the people of this world. It is roughly true that one finds life in general like a mirror; that if one looks into it with a smile and a cordial hand held out one meets smiles and outstretched hands in return. Through all his days it had happened so with this child of a French village.

So that when the day came at last when he stood once more on the deck of the Lovely Lucy, loaded with her cargo of tobacco for foreign ports, Francois felt as if he were leaving home and family. The long green carpet of the rolling lawn of Roanoke was crowded with people come to tell him good-by. All of his soldier boys were there, the lads trained by him, one and all ready to swear by him or to die for him. Lucy and Harry stood together, and the servants were gathered to do him honor, and people had ridden from all over the county for the farewell. His eyes dimmed with tears of gratefulness, he watched them as the gangplank was drawn up and the sails caught the wind and the ship swung slowly out into the stream.

"Come back again—come back again," they called from the shore.

Francois heard the deep tones of the lads and the rich voices of the negroes and he knew that some there could not speak, even as he could not. So he waved his hat silently, and the ship moved faster and the faces on the lawn seemed smaller farther away, and yet he heard those following voices calling to him, more faintly:

"Come back again—oh, come back again!"

And with that the negroes had broken into a melody, and the ship moved on to the wild sweet music. Way Down Upon de S'wanee Ribber, the negroes sang, and the ship was at the turn of the river. The stately walls of Roanoke house, the green slope crowded with figures of his friends, the sparkling water front—the current had swept away all of the picture and he could only hear that wailing music of the negroes voices, lower, more fitful; and now it was gone. He had left Virginia; he was on his way to friends. And for all his joy of going, he was heavy-hearted for the leaving.

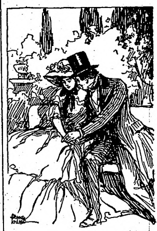
The weeks went slowly at sea, but after a while he had landed, was in France, was at Vicques. He had seen his mother, with her hair whitened by those years of his prison life—a happy woman now, full of business and responsibility, yet always with a rapt look in her face as of one who lived in a deep inner quiet. He had talked long talks with his prosperous father and slipped into his old place among his brothers and sisters, utterly refusing to be made a stranger or a great man. And over and over again he had told the story of his capture and the story of his escape.

At the castle the returned wanderer picked up no less the thread dropped so suddenly seven years before. The general, to whom the boy seemed his boy risen from the dead, would hardly let him from his sight; Alixe kept him in a tingling atmosphere of tenderness and mockery and sisterly devotion, which thrilled him and chilled him and made him blissful and wretched in turns. The puzzle of Alixe was more unreadable than the puzzle of the sphinx to the three men who loved her, to her father and Francois and Pietro. The general and Francois spoke of it guardedly, in few words, once in a long time, but Pietro never spoke. Pietro was there often, yet more often away in London, where the exiled Mazzini, at the head of one wing of Italian patriots, lived and conspired. And other men appeared suddenly and disappeared at the chateau, and held conferences with the general and Francois in that large dim library where the little peasant boy had sat with his thin ankles twisted about the legs of his high chair, and copied the history of Napoleon. These men paid great attention nowadays to the words of that peasant boy.

"As soon as you are a little stronger," they said, "there is much work for you to do," and the general would come in at that point with a growl like distant thunder.

"He is to rest," the general would order. "He is to rest till he is well. He has done enough; let the boy alone, you others."

But the time came, six months after his return, when Francois must be sent to visit the officers of certain regiments thought to be secretly Bonapartist; when he, it was believed, could get into touch with them and tell them enough and not too much of the plans of the party, and find out where they stood and how much one might count on them. So, against the general's wish, Francois went off on a political mission. It proved more complicated than had seemed probable; he was gone a long time; he had to travel and endure exhausting experiences for which he was not yet fit. So that when he came home to Vicques, two months later, he was white and transparent and ill. And there were some of the mysterious men at the chateau to meet him, delighted, pitiless. Delighted with the work he had done, with his daring and finesse and success, without pity for his weakness, begging him to go at once on another mission. The general was firm as to that; his boy should not be hounded; he should stay at home in the quiet old chateau and get well. But the boy was restless; a fever of enthusiasm was on him and he wanted to do more and yet more for the prince's work.



His Voice Was Full of Passion and Pleading.

At this point two things happened: Pietro came from London, and Francois, on the point of leaving for another secret errand, broke down and was ill. He lay in his bed in his room at the farmhouse, the low upper chamber looking out—through wide-open casement windows, their old leaded little panes of glass glittering from every uneven angle—looking out at broad fields and bouquets of chestnut trees, and far off, five miles away, at the high red roofs of the chauteau of Vicques. And gazing so, he saw Pietro on old Capitaine, turn from the shady avenue of the chestnuts and ride slowly to the house. With that he heard his mother greeting Pietro below in the great kitchen, then the two voices—the deep one and the soft one—talking, talking, a long time. What could his mother and Pietro have to talk about so long? And then Pietro's step was coming up the narrow stair, and he was there, in the room.

"Francois," Pietro began in his direct fashion, "I think you must go back to Virginia."

Francois regarded him with startled eyes, saying nothing. There was a chill and an ache in his heart at the thought of yet another parting.

Pietro went out. "I have a letter from Harry Hampton. The place needs you; the people want you; and Harry and Miss Hampton say they will not be married unless you come to be best man at the wedding." Francois smiled. Pietro went on again. "Moreover, boy, Francois—you are not doing well here. You are too useful; they want to use you constantly and you are ready; but you are not fit. You must get away for another year or two. Then you will be well and perhaps by then the prince will have real work for you. And you must have strength for that time. Your mother says I am right." With that his mother stood in the doorway, regarding him with her calm eyes, and nodded to Pietro's words. So it came about that Francois went back shortly to Virginia.

On the day before he went he sat in the garden of the chateau with Alixe, on the stone seat by the sun-dial where they had sat years before when the general had seen him kiss the girl's hand, in that unbrotherly way which had so surprised him.

"Alixe," said Francois, "I am going to the end of the world."

"Not for the first time," Alixe answered cheerfully.

"Perhaps for the last," Francois threw back dramatically. It is hard to have one's best-beloved discount one's tragedies. And Alixe laughed and lifted a long stem of a spring flower which she held in her hand, and brushed his forehead delicately with the distant tip of it.

"Smooth out the wrinkles, do not frown; do not look solemn; you always come back, Monsieur the Bad Penny; you will this time. Do not be melodramatic, Francois."

Francois, listening to these same sentiments, was hurt, and not at all inspired with cheerfulness. "Alixe," he said—and knew that he should not say it—"there is something I have wanted all my life—all my life."

"Is there?" inquired Alixe in commonplace tones. "A horse, per exemple?" He caught her hand, disregarding her tone; his voice was full of passion and pleading. "Do not be heartless and cold today, Alixe, dear Alixe. I am going so far, and my very soul is torn with leaving you—all."

It takes no more than a syllable, an inflection at times, to turn the course of a life. If Francois had left his sentence alone before that last little word; if he had told the girl that his soul was torn with leaving her, then it is hard to say what might have happened. But—"you all"—he did not wish then to have her think that it meant more to leave her than to leave the others. Alixe readjusted the guard which had almost slipped from her, and stood again defensive.

"I won't be cruel, Francois; you know how we—all—are broken-hearted to have you go."

Francois caught that fatal little word "all," repeated, and dimly sow its significance, and his own responsibility. Alixe went on.

"I wonder if I do not know—what it is—that you have wanted all your life?"

Eagerly Francois caught at her words. "May I tell you Alixe, Alixe?"

"No." Alixe spoke quickly. "No, let me guess. It is—it is"—and Francois, catching his breath, tried to take the word from her, but she stopped him. "No, I must—tell it. You have wished—all your life"—Alixe was breathing rather fast—"that—I should care for—Pietro."

A cold chill at hearing that thing said in that voice seized him. Very still his eyes down, he did not speak.

"Is—is that it?"

There is an angel of perversity who possesses our souls at times. He makes us say the unkind thing when we wish not to; he tangles our feet so that we fall and trip and hurt ourselves and our dearest—and behold long after we know that all the same it was an angel; that without that trouble we should have gone forever down the easy wrong way. We know that the perverse angel was sent to warn us off the pleasant grass which was none of ours, and by making things disagreeable at the psychological moment, save our souls alive for right things to come. Some such crosswise heavenly messenger gripped the mind of Alixe, and she said what she hated herself for saying, and saw the quick result in the downcast misery of poor Francois' face. And then the same cruel, wise angel turned his attention to Francois. "If she thinks that, let her," whispered the perverse one. "Let it go at that; say yes."

And Francois lifted mournful eyes and repeated, "That you should love Pietro—yes—that is what I have wished for all my life.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Summoned.

On the morning of May 9, 1840, the sun shone gaily in London. It filtered in intricate patterns through the curtains which shaded the upper windows of a house in Carlton gardens, and the breeze lifted the lace, and sunlight and breeze together touched the bent head of a young man who sat at a writing-table. A lock of hair had escaped on his forehead and the air touched it, lifted it, as if to say: "Behold the Napoleonic curl! See how he is like his uncle!"

But the pen ran busily, regardless of the garrulous breeze; there was much to do for a hard-working prince who found time to be the hero of ballrooms, the center of a London season, and yet could manipulate his agents throughout the garrisons of France, and plan and execute a revolution. It was the year when the body of Napoleon the First was brought from St. Helena to Paris, and Louis Bonaparte had resolved, in that steady mind which never lost its grip on the reason of being of his existence, that with the ashes of the emperor his family should come back to France. For months the network had been spread, was tightening, and now the memory which held its friendships securely always, took thought of a Frenchman living in Virginia. As soon as his letter was finished to his father—the pen flew across the lines:

"The sword of Austerlitz must not be in an enemy's hands," he wrote to his father. "It must stay where it may again be lifted in the day of danger for the glory of France." His letters were apt to be slightly oratorical; it was moreover the fashion of the day to write so.

He raised his head and stared into the street. It was enough to decide his expedition for this summer that General Bertrand, well-meaning, and ill-judging, had given to Louis Philipe the arms of the emperor, to be placed in the Invalides. Every member of the Bonaparte family was aroused, and to the heir it was a trumpet call. He could hardly wait to go to France, to reclaim that insulted sword. He wrote on, finished the letter to the exiled king, his father, a gloomy and lonely old man whom the son did not forget through years spent away from him.

Then he drew out a fresh sheet of paper, and his faint smile gleamed; for the thought of this adherent in Virginia was pleasant to him.

"Chevalier Francois Beaupre," he headed the letter, and began below, "My friend and Marshal of Some Day." He considered a moment and wrote quickly as if the words boiled to the pen. "The baton awaits you. Come. I make an expedition within three months, and I need you and your faith in me. Our stars must shine together to give full light. So, mon ami, join me here at the earliest, that the emperor's words may come true.

"LOUIS BONAPARTE."

Across the water, in Virginia, two years had made few changes. On the June day when the prince's letter lay in the post office of Norfolk the last of the roses were showing pink and red over the gardens in a sudden breeze. The leaves of the trees that arched the road that led to Roanoke house were sappy green, just lately fully spread, and glorious with freshness. Their shadows, dancing on the white pike, were sharp cut against the brightness. And through the light-pierced cave of shade a man traveled on horseback from one plantation to another, a man who rode as a Virginian rides, yet with a military air for all that. He patted the beast's neck with a soothing word, and smiled as Aquarelle plunged at the waving of a bough, at a fox that ran across the road. But if an observer had been there he might have seen that the man's thought was not with horse or journey. Francois Beaupre, riding out to give a French lesson to Miss Hampton at Roanoke house, as he had been doing for four years, all unconscious as he was of the letter awaiting for him at the moment in Norfolk, was thinking of the event to come to which that letter called him.

"Lucy! Oh, Lucy!" A voice called from the lawn, and in a moment more the colonel was upon them. "Lucy," he began, "somebody must arrange about the new harnesses; my time is too valuable to be taken up with details. Uncle Zack says they are needed at once. It has been neglected. I do not understand why things are so neglected."

"I have seen to it, father. They will be ready in a week," Lucy answered.

Then the colonel noticed Francois. "Good day, chevalier," he spoke condescendingly. "Ah—by the way"—he put a hand into one pocket and then another of his linen coat. "They gave me a letter for you, chevalier, knowing that you would be at Roanoke house today. Here it is"—and Lucy saw a light leap into Francois' eyes as they fell on the English postmark.

And Lucy spoke quietly again. "I did ask you, father, but you did not see to it, and they were necessary. So I did it." And then, "chevalier, read your letter. I see it is a foreign one."

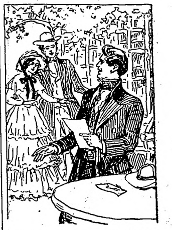
"Will mademoiselle pardon?"

At that moment an uneven step came down the slope and Francois flashed a smile at Harry Hampton and retreated to the other side of the summer-house with his letter; while the colonel, murmuring complaints about harnesses, went strolling up the shadowy, bird-haunted lawn.

Harry Hampton stood by his sweetheart with a boyish air of proprietorship, radiant, as he had been through these two years of his engagement. "I have it," he announced. "Don't you want to see it?"

"Wait, Harry;" the girl glanced at Francois. But the lad caught her waist. "Look," he said, and opened his free hand and a plain gold ring glittered from it. With a quick movement he slipped it over the little third finger. "There," he said, "that will be on to stay pretty soon, and then Uncle Henry shall not badger you about harnesses. He has made me wait two years because he needed you, but I won't wait much longer, will I, Lucy? Next Wednesday—that is the wedding day, Lucy."

With that Francois turned around. His face shone with an excitement which could not escape even preoccupied lovers.



"You Have News—What Is It?" the Girl Cried.

"What is it, chevalier? You have news—what is it?" the girl cried.

For a moment he could not speak. Then: "Yes, mademoiselle, great news," he said. "The prince has sent for me. And I am well and fit to go. I have lived for this time; yet I am grieved to leave you and Harry, my two old friends."

"But, Francois, you cannot go before Wednesday," Harry Hampton cried out. "We cannot be married without you."

And Francois considered. "No, not before Wednesday," he agreed.

That last French lesson in the summer-house on the banks of the smooth-flowing James river was on a Saturday. On Monday the Chevalier Beaupre rode over from Carnifax and asked to see Miss Hampton.

Women and Exercise.

Most women, whether they be fleshy or thin, walk far too little. The woman who tends to be fleshy should walk for at least an hour every day, and do it regularly and systematically. As she gets accustomed to the exercise she should increase the number of miles she walks a day until she is doing five miles.

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 2c 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

Our compositor asked us why we did not run for governor of Minnesota, and we replied "We would stand about as much show of being elected as some of the other ones that are in the race.

Now The Duluth Evening Herald has come out supporting O'Neill all they can. It will soon be time for the twin city dailies to dig in, for it would be too bad if their faithful servant Hon. Dan should fail to get elected

E. G. Iverson has positively refused to being elimated as a candidate for governor by the Republican Conference to be held at Minneapolis, March 19th. Iverson was the first to file for this nomination, and is by far the best man for the position, but if the rest of them stay in the fight, Eberhart is quite sure to get the nomination, for if Iverson is the strongest opponent against him, the others will all get a few votes. Elwell will draw a big vote away from Peterson in Minneapolis, but that wont make much difference as neither of them stands any show whatever of being nominated, and they know this, as well as anyone.

If that elimation convention that is to be held at Minneapolis on March 19th, can agree on one candidate for the opposition to Eberhart to support, their choice would undoubtedly be nominated and elected. But there is very little prospect that they will agree, as all of the candidates will naturally want to be THE CHOSEN ONE. If they don't agree, Eberhart will put them over the dump in June, and the Democrats will send him tumbling. after in November. We do not mean that the Democratic party will do all of this retiring of Eberhart, as we do not concede that they have a majority in this state, but there will be enough disgusted Republicans ready to give them a lift to clean up that state gang to make them sure winners.

That Mexican situation is certainly getting very warm, but President Wilson is handling the reins of this government's policy with a cool and business head. Suppose there is occasionally an American and an Englishman gets killed in the mix up down there, it is better to let them take their own chances than to rush this country into a war that will mean the death of thousands of just as good men as they are. Americans have been warned to get out of that country, and if they persist in remaining they do so at their own risk of either being shot or hanged, But if this government does intervene; they should put forces enough in there to establish peace and maintain it, the same as they have done in the Philipines. It would be a waste of lives and money to send forces in there to try to pacify them wild greasers, for they will continue their savage warfare, in less than six months after they have been pacified. To take over that country and place them under the stars and stripes is the only way to establish peace that will last.

That Elimation Convention should be handled with the same care as a dynamite bomb, for if there is an explosion the Democratic party will promptly pick up the fragments and patch up a fairly good looking democrat that will take a seat in that governor's chair, on January 1st, 1915. Now do not forget this fact gentlemen; a united Republican party can win, but with a divided party at the primaries, and Eberhart as the winner, all the Democratic Party has got to do, is to bray and start his record he will win an easy victory in November.

Representative O'neill has s yet failed to answer any of our inquiries relative to his record which we published several weeks ago. A good many have asked us as to how he stands on several of these question, and as to whether or not he was going to reply. Can't say, gentleman. Maybe he'll tell you later. Maybe he stands pat, and maybe he don't. Can't never tell. Anyhow, we have offered him all the space he wants to reply, free gratis, for nothing and without remmeration or hore of reward, and it's up to him.—Thief River Falls News-Press.

We will also give Mr. O'Neill free space to explain his reasons for some of his votes in the last Legislature on questions where the interests of the farmers, and the country districts were on one side and the cities on the other, and his record shows that he voted with the cities every time.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate, I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support;

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state,

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered!

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON,

ELWELL ALSO FILES.

To the People of the State of Minnesota:

I am a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor of Minnesota. On my record as a private citizen and a public officer, I ask the support of my fellow citizens.

I am announcing my candidacy at this time because I believe that the best interests of the state demand it. I have not entered the race to disrupt the program of other candidates, but I feel called upon, after many years of service to the state both as a private citizen and as a public servant elected by the people, to continue my efforts toward the realization of laws and measures which I have advocated for many years and from which I believe the people of the state may receive the maximum amount of benefit.

A Poem Satirizes King George.

A funny satiric poem is being circulated in London society though it is rigidly guarded and not allowed to get into print. It is a duologue between a lord in waiting and a lady in waiting, who both commit suicide from ennui. The title and constantly recurring refrain is a rhythmical phrase which humorously contrasts the king's moods and wit with the queen's. The author is known to be one of London's brilliant, irresponsible geniuses.—Liverpool Post.

FITTED FOR CHIEF EXECUTIVE.

(Aitkin Republican.)

State Auditor Iverson, the one man who stands out pre-eminently fitted to step into the chief executive office, and reorganize the interlocking departments of the state's affairs, has announced himself a candidate for governor, with "Economy and Law-Enforcement" as the keynote of his platform. The Republican has so clearly made itself understood as in favor of this in former issues that it is needless to repeat now. The state has trained Mr. Iverson for this work, and the state is entitled to the benefit of his knowledge.

Whistler's Criticism.

Dante Gabriel Rossetti once showed Whistler a sketch and asked his opinion.

"It has its good points, Rossetti," said Whistler. "Go ahead with it by all means."

Later he inquired how it was getting along. "All right," answered Rossetti cheerfully. "I've ordered a stunning frame for it."

In due time the canvas appeared at Rossetti's house, beautifully framed.

"You've done nothing to it since I saw it, have you?" said Whistler.

"No-o," replied Rossetti, "but I've written a sonnet on the subject, if you'd like to hear it."

He recited some lines of peculiar tenderness.

"Rossetti," said Whistler, as the recitation ended, "take out the picture and frame the sonnet."

Needed a Stronger Pull.

Jones, a new recruit, was sent out for target practice on the ranges. He did fairly well at 300 yards for a new one, but at 800 he generally managed to drop his bullets short. The sergeant patiently explained the raising of the sights and so on. But Jones still fell short. He saw the sergeant coming back. His "buddy" whispered to him.

"Sergeant 'll ask you why," the "buddy" said. "He'll want you to tell him. I see what the trouble is. It's"— Here his voice was scarcely audible. The recruit fired away—short again.

"Why in blazes can't you shoot higher?" demanded the sergeant. "What's the trouble?"

"I've found out what the trouble is, sir," answered the recruit. "I'm afraid I haven't been pulling the trigger hard enough."—New York Post.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hodgeson will move into the residence on the Holum farm south of Highlanding.

There is to be a republican convention at Thief River Falls tomorrow to elect delegates to go to the Minneapolis convention on March 19th,.

Mr. and Mrs. P. McAndress of Thief River Falls and Mrs. Dan Sullivan of Crystal N. D. are visiting Mr. and Mrs. Walt McAndress this week.

Bro. Lattimore of the Eleven Towns is making himself famous as an Editor, as it took both of the Thief River Falls papers to answer him last week.

George Cunningham, from Pea Soup Island was an overnight visitor at C. L. Clarks last, night. He says that country is, booming since they got it ditched out and a railroad building into it.

James O'Brien had a very successful auction yesterday and sold off all of his stock and farm machinery at good prices, which would indicate that there are plenty of people that are looking for stock and farm machinery to buy.

Eddy Hyland is drilling a deep well on the farm of mail carrier Ljot Sigurdson. He struck an obstruction at a depth of 140 feet and had to start in a new place, which means a loss of about $150.

C. H. Newbury, the Thief River Falls liveryman will sell his entire stock of sixteen head of horses at public auction on next Friday, March 20th, also a lot of harnesses and buggies, on the usual terms of auction sales, time until fall.

One of the biggest auction sales of the season will be given on the farm of Walter McAndress on Wednesday March 18. See large auction bills for list of property. The usual terms of sale will be given.

W. J. LaBree Auctioneer
Henry J. Enderle Clerk.

Even J. Sund one of our early homesteaders returned home to his farm Tuesday, on account of part of his farm being low lying land he has not been able to cultivate it, but ditch 47 has now drained it, and he will settle on it and start extensive improvements this summer.

At the annual township election held in Highlanding township, Tuesday the following officers were elected;

A. Hanson, Supervisor for three years. E. P. Heggestuen, Supervisor for two years. P. P. Palmer, Town Clerk. Ole Howard, Treasurer, John Lattimore, and W. G Hunt, Justices of the Peace. T. S. Jacobson and Ben Kvesle, Constables. The usual town taxes were voted.

The management of the Electric Railway Line seem to be peeved because we published a local last week to the effect that there was a rumor that they had sold out to the Soo Company. We got our information from what we considered a reliable source, and of course believed it, but there was nothing to it as will be seen by an article published in another column, and the company will have the dirt flying on the line as soon as the frost is out of the ground.

Electric Line Being Built.

"Yes, the railroad has been adequately financed. There is no more stock available. The bridge across Thief River will be completed in two weeks and by August first we expect to be in the town of Goodridge, which means that the first twenty miles of road will then be in operation," said Daniel Shaw, president of the Minnesota Northwestern Electric Railway in an interview last Wednesday afternoon. "The rumor that the road had been sold out and that the stockholders were being refunded their money was false. It doubtless started from the fact that the company has reduced its capitol stock and was calling the shares under the old capitalization and issuing new ones."

Present plans contemplate starting on the grading the road bed and laying the ties just as soon as the frost is out of the ground in the spring. The first car now being built by the road is rapidly nearing completion and will be put in service as soon as the road bed is finished.—Thief River Falls News-Press.

DROPPED OUT OF SIGHT.

Tarjei H. Kolshus, of Greibrok, is contesting his brothers claim in the town of Hickory. His brother left for the lumber woods a year ago last fall and the last he heard from him was at Cloquet Minnesota soon after he left his home. Since that time all trace of him has been as completely lost, as if the ground had opened and swallowed him, and his brother is now contesting the claim to keep it for him if he returns, but it is doubtful if he is ever heard of again, for if he met sudden death by accident and had no papers on him by which he could be identified, he would be given a good burial by the authorities, and the whole matter forgotten the next day. Such is life!

A LAST SUMMERS WEDDING SUIT.

A HICKORY TOWN STORY.

The following story is going the rounds:

A young man concluded that the home merchant did not advertise a very good line of clothing, so he sent to a catalogue house to get something strictly up to date. When the suit arrived, in the pockets of the pants he found a note reading this way: Should this fall into the hands of a good looking young man who desires to correspond with a young lady of sweet disposition, kindly address, etc. The young man promptly sent a letter to the address and a few days later received a reply as follows: —"Sir my wife is in receipt of a letter from you in her girl's name. She says that twenty years ago she wrote the note. She is now my lawful wife and mother of eleven children. If you do not quit writing to her, I will make a trip to your town, and make your face look like forty cents worth of hamburger sausage."

Moral: If you want up to date clothes made for 1914 people, with the latest cuts and trimmings and good goods for your money, either have them made to order, or trade with your home merchants.

BACK TO MINESOTA.

Paddy Sullivan and Alfred Eve, who left here for other states a few years ago have both moved back into the plain "bread and butter" state, after having tried other lands of milk and honey to their entire satisfaction. Minnesota stands the test of being one of the best states in the Union, when tried out by actual experience, the only trouble with it is: that it is not overburdend with professional liars and land sharks so much as other localities, but when it comes to a show down "Minnie" can deliver the goods.

Poetic Heredity.

Of poetic families, the Coleridges, like the Tennysons, are hard to beat. The author of "Christobel" had a daughter and two sons—all poets. The first, Sara, wrote lyrics which, according to Dr. Garnett, entitle her "to rank high among English poetesses." The eldest son, Hartley, in the same critic's opinion, was a sonneteer "among the most perfect in the language." Derwent, the other son, wrote some very beautiful verses in Knight's Quarterly Magazine of 1822 and elsewhere. Derwent's son, Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge, is the author of a volume of poems. The Hon. Stephen Coleridge has several volumes to his credit as a poet, and everybody who is a verse lover knows of the late Mary E. Coleridge, whose beautiful gift appeared through a volume of poems in 1907. And there is an E. P. Coleridge, who has rescued certain translations of the classics from ridicule.—London Chronicle.

DOES WHAT HE THINKS IS RIGHT

(St. Peter Free Press.)

The expected has happened. State Auditor Samuel G. Iverson is out with the announcement of his candidacy for governor. That this would be the final outcome has been surmised for some months past and it is generally conceded that he will prove a strong candidate.

In his announcement he makes economy and law enforcement the paramount issue. He calls attention to the need of a thorough reorganization and co-operation of all departments, in order to make it possible to obtain greater efficiency and economy. It is his opinion that there should be "team work" among the heads of the several divisions and that the "invisible government" should be dragged from its place of hiding and exposed to the bright rays of publicity. Statistics are cited to prove useless extravagance and attention is called to the fact that while the increase of the state's population from 1900 to 1910 was 18½ per cent the expenditures during that time increased 134 per cent. Aside from greater efficiency and economy Mr. Iverson strongly urges a vigorous enforcement of existing laws and suggests that public officers who willfully neglect or refuse to enforce the laws be promptly suspended and, if found guilty, removed from office, and he also expresses the opinion that "the moral, social, industrial and political life of our state would be greatly advanced by giving the women an equal right to vote."

This is a strong program, good enough for any gubernatorial candidate, and should meet with general public approval. But will it? While no one can successfully combat the charge of extravagance, it is also a deplorable fact that the many private interests adversely affected by the reforms suggested will do all they can to counteract the proposed innovation.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

TOBACCO GROWING AS AN EXPERIMENT

STATE 1913 TOBACCO CROP IS GREATEST YET PRODUCED.

ACREAGE IS BEING INCREASED

More Than One Hundred Minnesota Farmers Engage in Production of Weed—"U." Is Experimenting Also.

St. Paul.—The tobacco investigations carried on in Minnesota for the past four years show that the 1913 crop was the largest and best ever produced in Minnesota, according to the report of state tobacco experts.

Acreage Has Increased.

The acreage has greatly increased, until now there are more than 100 farmers raising tobacco, in Sherburne, Stearns, Benton, Dodge and Olmsted counties. More than 100 acres of land were devoted to tobacco last season and 145,276 pounds were marketed at a cash value of $10,610.61. Prices were from 6 to 12 cents per pound. Never in the history of Clear Lake was so much money paid out to the farmers for any farm crop in one day as Saturday, February 14, when approximately five carloads of tobacco were shipped from Clear Lake to manufacturers of Madison, Wis.

The weather conditions in general last season were not the best. The tobacco was not sold and marketed at the best advantage this year, owing to the fact that the growers could not agree about selling at the proper time when prices were highest. An association of growers has now been organized and the marketing of the 1914 crop will be through this body.

University Experiments.

One acre of land was rented by the University of Minnesota for experimental work. Experiments were carried on with three varieties of tobacco, Connecticut Havana, Spanish Comstock and Silver Leaf. It was decided that Connecticut Havana is the best variety for Minnesota and enough seed was produced and saved of this variety to supply all growers. Experiments were also carried on in planting corn for windbreaks. Four rows of corn and four rows of tobacco gave the best results. Experiments were carried on at Minnesota state reformatory in planting tobacco on acre plats surrounded by trees. This proved successful and produced the finest crop in the section.

PLAN TO BOOST MINNESOTA

Land Men Organize to Induce Settlers to Take Up Vacant Land.

Minneapolis.—Representative land men of Minnesota, anxious to spread gospel of the state's resources to prospective settlers throughout the union, organized the Minnesota Farm Lands association here. J. H. McGilvery of Milaca was elected president.

A program of advertising and publicity that will mean much to Minnesota and the future settlement of the state was mapped out. The association will maintain headquarters in Minneapolis with a paid secretary in charge.

While the land men were enthusiastically planning for the fuller advertising of the state's resources, James J. Hill, railroad builder and Minnesota pioneer, cautioned them to see first that the land produced sufficient to attract settlers.

Teachers to Meet at St. Cloud.

St. Cloud.—Educators from all over this section will attend the eighteenth annual meeting of the Central Minnesota Educational association, which will be held at the normal school here March 12, 13 and 14. Superintendent C. H. Barnes of the St. Cloud public schools is president of the association and Professor I. T. Johnsrud of the normal faculty is secretary. Round tables, sectional meetings in agriculture, the industries and the upper and lower grades and a school officers' meeting will be features of the convention.

Waseca Association 50 Years Old.

Waseca.—At the annual meeting of the Waseca County Anti-Horse Thief association, J. S. Root was elected president, A. S. Hawkes, vice president; Hiram Powell, secretary, and R. P. Ward, treasurer. This was the fiftieth annual meeting.

Will Not Be Eliminated.

Minneapolis, March 6.—State Auditor announces that he will continue a candidate for the republican nomination for governor of Minnesota, regardless of the action taken at the anti-machine conference of March 19. The announcement is made in a letter to W. E. Lee, a rival candidate. Mr. Iverson had expressed an inclination to abide by the conference action, but since the refusal of James A. Peterson to bind himself, he has come to the conclusion that a complete elimination will not be possible.

SECRETARY OF STATE JULIUS A. SCHMAHL IS OUT FOR RENOMINATION

Julius A. Schmahl, now serving his fourth term as Secretary of State, has again filed for the Republican nomination. During the past year, Mr. Schmahl has re-organized his office on a card system basis, making it as thoroughly up-to-date as any in the United States. Mr. Sohmahl polled more than twice as many votes as his nearest opponent at the last general election.

SUSPECTED OF BRUTAL ATTACK

MAN ARRESTED ALLEGED TO HAVE TORTURED WOMAN AND BOY.

Series of Deductions Leads Detectives Far in Search for Criminal—Confession Is Alleged.

Minneapolis. — After a long series of deductions that read like a chapter from Sherlock Holmes, the police arrested Louis T. Johnson on a farm 17 miles from Russell, Lyon county, Minn., on a charge of attacking Mrs. C. E. MacRae and Leslie Almquist in a grocery here last Saturday afternoon.

Mrs. MacRae was stabbed six times and a poker shoved down her throat. The Almquist boy was beaten and the poker also shoved down his throat.

Superintendent of Police Martinson received a telephone message from Detectives John Irving and Fred Ohmann, who had run down the clues in the case and made the arrest, that Johnson, after stoutly maintaining that he knew nothing about the case had broken down and admitted that he had attacked the woman and the boy and that his sole purpose was to rob the cash drawer for cash to meet the immediate needs of himself and bride whom he had married the night before he made the attack.

It was on two meager clews, a newspaper from which a marriage license had been cut and a remark that Johnson is said to have made to Mrs. MacRae to the effect that his name was Johnson and that he had been married the night before, that Irving and Ohmann laboriously built up a network around the suspect.

The man who brutally attacked Mrs. MacRae as she was getting a few cents worth of apples for him, had been loitering in the store for nearly an hour. Mrs. MacRae thought he was there to seek shelter from the cold and wind storm of last Saturday. While he was apparently "killing time," he made remarks, once saying that his name was Johnson and that he had been married on Friday night. These facts came back to Mrs. MacRae after she had recovered from the effects of the attack sufficiently to tell the police the story.

Identified as Assaulter.

Minneapolis.—Louis T. Johnson, arrested on a farm seventeen miles from Russel, Lyon county, on a charge of assaulting Mrs. C. E. MacRae and Leslie Almquist, was taken to the bedsides of his alleged victims upon his return to this city and was positively identified by both as the man who had savagely attacked them in the MacRae grocery and forced a poker down their throats.

Fergus Falls.—Work has been begun on a modern hotel which C. W. Kaddatz will erect. The building will be three stories high, and will have sixty rooms for guests.

Winona. May Not Participate.

Winona.—There will be no regularly called mass county conference in Winona county on March 14, to name delegates to the state delegate convention to be held at Minneapolis on March 19, when republicans opposed to the renomination of Governor Eberhart hope to agree upon a candidate. George C. Landon, chairman of the Winona county republican committee, says he will call no county conference, so if one is to be held the call will have to come from other than official sources.

EX-MINNESOTA SOLON HELD

ALONZO J. WHITMAN CHARGED WITH THEFT.

Man Arrested in Arkansas Was a Former Resident of Duluth—Companion Also Taken.

Chicago, Ill. — Word of the arrest in Hot Springs, Ark., of Alonzo J. Whitman, former member of the Minnesota state legislature, and a resident of Duluth, has been received at the Chicago branch of the Pinkerton National Detective agency. He was taken on a charge of swindling a Zion City woman out of $2,500. Jackson Deforest, his companion, was arrested with him, charged with raising a $6 check to $6,000.

Whitman was arrested on a warrant sworn out by Miss Sarah Conger. She charges that while he was living at the Zion City hotel she asked him to deposit $2,500 in the First National bank for her, and that he made the deposit in his own name, later checking out most of it. The Pinkerton men say he lost a great deal of money gambling.

Deforest is fighting extradition, but Whitman agreed to return to Chicago voluntarily. After he has been put on trial for the Zion City affair he will be taken to New York, where he is wanted for forging a check on the Fourth National bank.

Whitman obtained employment in Zion City as a teacher in a public school. He lived there with his mother. After Deforest had been warned by the authorities to leave Danville, N. Y., his home, and also that of Whitman, he went to Zion City. From there the two men went west.

Here are extracts of Whitman's record, taken from the books of the Pinkerton agency:

In Chicago, on June 23, 1894, he appeared at the Washington Park race track, and attempted to collect $300 from each of the 90 bookmakers.

On July 13, 1894, he was arrested at Detroit, Mich., on a charge of forgery.

On Nov. 6, 1903, he was arrested at Chicago for defrauding the Auditorium hotel out of $200, but was discharged on account of making restitution and the pleas of his mother.

Whitman and several accomplices are said later to have defrauded the Fidelity Trust company of Buffalo, N. Y., of more than $3,000, by means of a draft for $59, which was raised to $9,000. He was indicted on six counts and arrested in St. Louis in 1904. While en route to Buffalo he escaped by jumping from the train. He later was rearrested in his Danville home, and tried on the first count of the indictment in March. He was acquitted, but later was convicted on another count.

He was sentenced to a term of eight years in New York in 1905. He was taken to the prison, and some time later was transferred to Dannemore, and was released in July, 1905.

It was alleged that when he was first received at the Auburn prison he was assigned to teaching in the prison school, and was secretly teaching some of the students how to defraud banks when they were liberated. This was the cause of his career as a teacher being closed.

WOMEN VOTE ON SALOONS

Vote at Starbuck Saturday With All Furbelows of Regular Election.

Starbuck.—The women of Starbuck held an election of their own on the saloon issue. As the state law fails to give them the right to vote with the men at the regular election, they called a special election for Saturday, three days ahead of the regular village meeting.

Saturday's election was held at the same places and conducted in the same manner as regular elections, but only women were allowed to vote and all the officials were women. The women did not vote on candidates for office—simply on the license issue.

Bemidji Fire; $100,000 Loss.

Bemidji Minn., March 6.—Fire Thursday morning completely destroyed the Bemidji Lumber company's sawmill at a total loss of $100,000. Three hundred men are throws out of work temporarily. The insurance amounts to $60,000. The mill will be re-built. The cause of the fire is unknown.

Clinton Reading Circle Officers.

Clinton.—The Clinton Reading circle has re-elected officers as follows: Mrs. E. M. Plummer, president; Mrs. F. S. Hanson, vice president; Mrs. L. A. Larson, secretary; Mrs. J. H. Erickson, treasurer; Mrs. S. D. Salvesen, librarian. The annual banquet will be held March 12.

Millionaire Post Wins Race.

Rochester, Minn., March 7.—C. W. Post, the millionaire food manufacturer of Battle Creek, Mich., won his race with death half across the continent when his special train arrived at the Great Western station in this city at three and one-half hours ahead of its schedule. Physicians attending Mr. Post said his condition was favorable and that he stood the journey well. Whether or not he will submit to an operation will not be known until after a consultation by physicians and surgeons.

WILSON'S MESSAGE ON CANAL TOLLS

EXECUTIVE THINKS THE TREATY PLEDGES HAVE BEEN VIOLATED.

WANTS NO EXEMPTION MADE

U. S. Vessels Should Not Be Favored If Nation Is to Pursue Honest Course, Says President.

Washington, March 5.—President Wilson today read to congress a special message urging that the exemption clause of the Panama canal act be repealed because it "constitutes a mistaken economic policy and is in plain contravention of our treaty with Great Britain." The message follows:

The Message in Full.

"Gentlemen of the congress—I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications to the interest of the country and and I now come to speak upon the matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree by the constitution itself with personal responsibility.

Earnestly Asks Repeal.

"I have come to ask for the repeal of that provision of the Panama canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

"In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to you to urge my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation.

But One Interpretation Abroad.

"Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

"We consented to the treaty, its language we accepted, if we did not originate it, and we are too big, too powerful, too self respecting a nation to interpret with too strained or refined a reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere in question and misunderstood.

Ought to Reverse Action.

"We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

"I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other meetings of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

WOODROW WILSON."

STUDENT MILITARY CAMPS

War Department Announces Summer Military Courses for Boys.

Washington, March 5.—Student military instruction camps will be opened by the war department next summer at Ludington, Mich., for the central section of the country, and at Monterey, Cal., for the West, it is announced. Burlington, Vermont, and Ashville, N. C., already have been selected for the northeastern and southeastern camps, and a fifth camp may be located at Spokane, Wash.

All the companies, except that at Monterey, will open July 6 and close Aug. 7. University and college students, members of graduating classes of high schools, and recent college graduates are eligible to participate.

A department bulletin issued explained that the purpose of the camps is to give the youth of the country an opportunity to receive a short military training, fitting them for service at the front if they should be needed.

Woman Not a Perjurer.

Chicago, March 5.—Miss Aileen Heppner, accused of perjury in connection with the Henning-Funk alienation suit, was found not guilty by a jury before Judge McDonald. Miss Heppner was a witness in the suit of John C. Henning, a bell boy, against Clarence S. Funk, former general manager of the International Harvester company, for alleged alienation of the affections of Mrs. Henning. The Henning suit resulted in a vindication of Mr. Funk.

FOR WHAT PURPOSE SAVED?

Leisurely Englishman at a Loss to Understand Value of Those Precious Four Minutes.

In no other metropolis of the world are similar expenditures contemplated for traffic purposes, and that for very obvious reasons. Not only is the physical conformation of New York without parallel, but nowhere else is there a public so insistent on the subject of "saving time." Minutes spent in transit must be cut down to the irreducible minimum, no matter how prodigally the saved time may be wasted.

In this connection, continues Alan Sullivan in Harper's Magazine, consider an actual occurrence. An Englishman who recently dropped in at a friend's office in Twenty-seventh street, was asked to dine. At the nearest subway station they took a local train to the Grand Central, there dived across the platform into an express that disgorged them at Seventy-second street, where they entered another local train that finally deposited them at the door of the Gothamite's apartment at Broadway and Seventy-ninth street. Followed then a smoke and a most leisurely dinner. Half-way through the dessert, the Briton looked at his host.

"I've been wondering why we took three trains to get here?"

"Why? We saved four minutes!"

The visitor pondered. "I say," he questioned, thoughtfully, "what are you going to do with them?"

Merely a Rehearsal.

"Charley proposed to me last night and I accepted him."

"Why, he proposed to me yesterday."

"Indeed? Well he did it so prettily that I was sure he had rehearsed several times."

WATERY BLISTERS ON FACE

Smithville, Ind.—"Six months ago our baby girl, one year old, had a few red pimples come on her face which gradually spread causing her face to become very irritated and a fiery red color. The pimples on the child's face were at first small watery blisters, just a small blotch on the skin. She kept scratching at this until in a few days her whole cheeks were fiery red color and instead of the little blisters the skin was cracked and scaly looking and seemed to itch and burn very much.

"We used a number of remedies which seemed to give relief for a short time then leave her face worse than ever. Finally we got a cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment. I washed the child's face with very warm water and Cuticura Soap, then applied the Cuticura Ointment very lightly. After doing this about three times a day the itching and burning seemed entirely gone in two days' time. Inside of two weeks' time her face seemed well. That was eight months ago and there has been no return of the trouble." (Signed) Mrs. A. K. Wooden, Nov. 4, 1912.

Your Great Chance to get a California Farm is NOW

In the great San Joaquin Valley, California, are chances today for money-making in fruit-growing, in dairying, in poultry-raising, that appeal to the man who wants to make his effort count for most.

Your markets are unlimited. There are the hungry big cities of the Pacific Coast, two of which are to have great expositions next year. Thousands of mines and lumber camps never get enough farm products. The rest of the world is glad to pay good prices for California fruit.

You will find a well developed country. You will find good roads and rural delivery. A neighborly, get-together and work-for-the-benefit-of-all spirit makes a success of co-operative effort in getting the profit for the grower.

Ambitious, progressive farmers are wanted to settle this wonderful valley. I know where the opportunities are, and I will gladly point them out. I can save you time and travel, because you need not duplicate the investigations my staff has made.

Our books, "San Joaquin Valley," "Dairying" and "Poultry," will give you a great deal of information. Then if you will write me what more you would like to know, I will tell you. The books are free. So is all the assistance and information which I can give you.

Santa Fe agricultural demonstrators will assist new settlers in selecting the right crops to get best results. One of these men will help you if you wish.

Just say "Send California books."

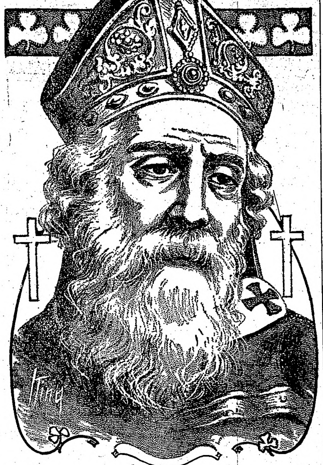
IRELAND'S PATRON SAINT



Ireland, thanks to the saint's eloquence and fervor, became a Christian country. His grand work accomplished St. Patrick died at Downpatrick, March 17, 465, it is said.

HIS GREAT LOVE FOR HIS PEOPLE

St. Patrick's Confession Shows How Ardently He Longed for Their Welfare.

Epistle Has Been Declared Worthy of the Greatest of the Teachers of the Word—Breastplate of Prayer a Short Litany—His Synod.

HOW yearningly St. Patrick loved his people may be learned from the following passage in his Confession, worthy of St. Augustine or St. Paul: "If I have ever done any good for the sake of my God, whom I love, I beg him to grant me that I may shed my blood with these proselytes and captives for his sake, even though I should never receive burial, or each member of my body should be most horribly thrown to the dogs and wild beasts, or the birds of prey should feed upon it." (Par. 24.)

His Confession ends with these words: "And this is my confession before I die." (Par. 25.)

For its humility, sweetness, faith, love and self-sacrifice it must be admired by all who read it.

The Breastplate of Prayer of St. Patrick is a sort of short litany professing belief in and invoking the Blessed Trinity. Our Lord's incarnation, resurrection and ascension; calling on the powers of heaven, of earth, etc., invoking Christ for himself and all of his.

Pilgrims at St. Patrick's Cross, Saint's Island, Lough Derg.

From other works not surely composed by St. Patrick, though probably reflecting the beliefs and practices of his times or those soon after him in Ireland, the synod of St. Patrick is composed of 31 canons. The twelfth is entitled: On our obligation toward the dead. And in the eighteenth is given an original interpretation of the three different degrees of fruitfulness of the gospel seed, declaring that those who are to reap a hundredfold reward are the bishops and doctors, who are all things to all men; those who are to have the sixtyfold are the clergy and widows; the thirtyfold shall be received by the laymen who are faithful. He also places monks and virgins with those who shall have the hundredfold.

A PRAYER.

(By St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, at Tara's Hill.)

At Tara today! the strength of God pilot me; the power of God preserve me; the wisdom of God instruct me; the eye of God watch over me; the ear of God hear me; the word of God give me sweet talk; the hand of God defend me; the way of God guide me. Christ be with me; Christ before me; Christ after me; Christ in me; Christ under me; Christ over me; Christ on my right hand; Christ on my left hand; Christ on this side; Christ on that side; Christ at my back; Christ in the heart of every person to whom I speak; Christ in the mouth of every person who speaks to me; Christ in the ear of every person who hears me. At Tara, today, I invoke the mighty power of the Trinity. Salvation is the Lord's—salvation is the Lord's. Salvation is Christ's. May thy salvation, O Lord, be always with us!

He who does not receive communion at Easter is declared to be not a "faithful" (Canon 22).

It is interesting to note that the synod forbids a man to take his dead brother's widow to wife, and declares that she shall be to him only a sister (Canon 25).

Little sympathy was given to avarice among the clergy, according to decrees IV., VIII. and XIII., while decree XIV. is interesting in showing that for murder, evil living or consulting auspices the sinner shall do penance for a year and afterward he shall be absolved by the priest.

After these follow a few "other canons attributed to St. Patrick," then the "Charter of St. Patrick," on the antiquity of the Church of Gastonbury in England, very quaint and entertaining. Next we have "The Book of St. Patrick the Bishop on the Three Dwellings," a profound yet practical and unctuous sermon on heaven, hell and this world.

Saint Knew Persecution.

If St. Patrick's conversion of Ireland was without persecution in the ordinary sense of the word, as used in the history of the church, yet he assures us: "I went about everywhere for your sakes in many dangers, even to the furthest district, beyond which nobody lived, and where no one had ever gone to baptize or to ordain clerics or to encourage the people; by the help of the Lord I have done all these things most faithfully and freely for your salvation." He tells us even that "on a certain dreadful day they tried most earnestly to kill me . . . and they threw me into chains. But on the fourteenth day the Lord delivered me from their power."

LIFE'S ROAD

Smoothed by Change of Food.

Worry is a big load to carry and an unnecessary one. When accompanied by indigestion it certainly is cause for the blues.

But the whole trouble may be easily thrown off and life's road be made easy and comfortable by proper eating and the cultivation of good cheer. Read what a Troy woman says:

"Two years ago I made the acquaintance of Grape-Nuts and have used the food once a day and sometimes twice ever since.

"At the time I began to use it life was a burden. I was for years afflicted with bilious sick headache, caused by indigestion, and nothing seemed to relieve me.

"The trouble became so severe I had to leave my work for days at a time.

"My nerves were in such a state I could not sleep and the doctor said I was on the verge of nervous prostration. I saw an adv. concerning Grape-Nuts and bought a package for trial.

"What Grape-Nuts has done for me is certainly marvelous. I can now sleep like a child, am entirely free from the old trouble and have not had a headache in over a year. I feel like a new person. I have recommended it to others. One man I knew ate principally Grape-Nuts while working on the ice all winter, and said he never felt better in his life."

"No, thank you," he replied, chuckling. "I'd rather sit here and laugh."

BACKACHE VANISHES RHEUMATIC PAINS GO

Few Doses of Croxone Ease Stiff, Sore, Swollen Joints and Muscles, Relieving Backache and Bladder Disorders.

If you suffer with backache—have pains in the neck or sides—nervous or dizzy spells—a few doses of Croxone will relieve the congestion and you will be surprised how quickly all kidney, bladder and rheumatic troubles will disappear.

Croxone promptly relieves these diseases because it really does reach the real cause. It soaks right into the walls and linings of the kidneys, cleans out the stopped-up inactive organs, neutralizes and dissolves the uric acid and makes the kidneys sift from the blood the waste and poisonous matter that lodge in the joints and muscles to scratch and irritate and cause rheumatism. It soothes and heals the delicate linings of the bladder and gives the kidneys renewed strength so they can filter the blood and keep you well.

Croxone is different from all other remedies. It is so prepared that it i practically impossible to take it wi out results. An original packag Croxone costs but a trifle, a druggists are authorized to re purchase price if it should single case.—Adv.

The Brother of the Moon

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman.)

"That vase," said Soltykoff, stopping before a bit of pottery some five inches high, placed in a teak-wood cabinet, "is worth one hundred thousand dollars. But if I could find its companion, and smash it, this one would then be worth a half million. But the chances are, I would be so enamored of their beauty that I would place them side by side in my collection and never sell them at all.

"It is a peach-blow vase, made during the reign of the Ming dynasty. There are only two in existence. This one was stolen from the emperor's apartments in the summer palace at Pekin during the looting of that city nine years ago. The other is owned by the emperor's uncle, known as the Brother of the Moon. His palace is fifty miles away, at Ling Kow-lun. He is a high official in the board of censors. That is all I can tell you about him—except that he is said to have incurred the enmity of the dowager empress recently. Now, do you still propose to carry out your undertaking?"

He watched Nikolai and myself narrowly. Soltykoff was the richest collector in China, and his annual sales were a sensation in London. We were seated in his apartments in Pekin, in the British concession, and he had made us a proposal. This was, in effect, that we should steal, or otherwise obtain, the companion vase from the Brother of the Moon, and convey it to him. For this he offered us fifty thousand dollars apiece.

"You cannot sell it except through me," said Soltykoff. "My name alone would stamp it as genuine. So—what is your decision?"

I looked at the shimmering, iridescent thing, so carefully placed behind the glass doors of the cabinet—which was, in turn, riveted to the roof and floor, proof against accident. Not even an earthquake could shatter it, for the rivets went through the boards below and into the foundations. And charged wires protected it, winding and twisting in and out of the cabinet itself.

"I accept," said Nikolai promptly.

"Good," said Soltykoff. "To gain admittance to the house of the prince will not be difficult. Just now he is crazed over western inventions and his doors are thronged with agents of commercial houses. Take him the newest scientific toy—a gyroscope, for example—and he will give you all his attention and lodge you in his palace. But where he hides the peach-blow vase nobody knows."

We set out for Ling Kow-lun that afternoon. Half the distance was made by the new railroad; thence we procured pack-mules and jogged along easily from inn to inn. It was a part of China much frequented by Europeans, and the populace paid us no unpleasant attentions. Two days afterward we were knocking for admittance at the palace of the prince.

During our stay in China, Nikolai had mastered enough of the commercial dialect to enable us to dispense with the services of an interpreter. Thus we proposed to have a distinct advantage over the other commercial travelers whom we expected to find. We had our gyroscope model with us; a little thing, slung upon my back—for, as usual, Nikolai assumed to be the lord and I his servant. I often think of the subservience into which I seemed to fall naturally when in his company. Sometimes, when I judge him [illegible], I try to believe that it was this natural deference which betrayed him into his act of treachery.

To our astonishment, the court beyond the entrance hall was empty. There was no sign of anyone but ourselves. The little Chinese boy who had opened to us ran away in terror, and everywhere I saw evidences of a hurried flight and of looting. Rich rooms, opening out on either side, had been stripped of their hangings and the more portable articles; costly furniture had been toppled over and thrust here and there pell-mell.

There is one room in a Chinese house of the better class wherein the owner of the house alone can sit—the host's room. Not even his wife, or wives, dare enter there until he summons them. To this room we came at last—and stood still in amazement upon the threshold.

For there, in the middle of the rich carpet, seated cross-legged, surrounded by half a dozen weeping women, sat the Brother of the Moon, wearing his mandarin's cap with its yellow button. His claw-like fingers were stretched out in his lap, and between them ran something with which he toyed—a slender cord of saffron silk. As we entered, the women looked up for an instant, and then fell to wailing and beating their breasts; but the Brother of the Moon sat impassively upon the floor, and ran the cord through his fingers.

Nikolai approached, stooped, and bent his forehead to the floor. I followed suit. Then we unpacked the gyroscope. But the Brother of the Moon paid not the least attention. He sat impassive as a statue of Buddha, and ran his fingers [illegible] forward through the [illegible], twinling the [illegible] of shimmering silk. At last, looking up, he addressed Nikolai in a slow and unimpassioned voice, to which Nikolai responded.

As he spoke, the women stopped wailing; I saw their faces light up for a moment, and then the impassive oriental calm fell upon them as a mask. But the Brother of the Moon and Nikolai were now in earnest conversation, and presently the prince signed to him to come upon the carpet and sit down at his side. Then he pointed one of his claw-like fingers at me, raising his eyebrows. Nikolai responded with a nod and poured forth a flood of impassioned speech.

After five minutes of this, Nikolai called to me and began to translate their conversation.

"You know, my dear Summers," he began, "that China is the land of contrasts. It appears that we have come here at a most fortunate moment. The prince, who was somewhat out of favor with the empress, has been completely forgiven and promoted. Henceforward he is to have the privilege of wearing two yellow buttons instead of one."

"He doesn't look as though it pleased him any," I said.

"That," rejoined Nikolai, "is part of the Chinese system of etiquette. By all this lamentation it is the prince's design to show how wholly unworthy he considers himself of this honor that has accrued to him. Well, Summers, I've taken the bull by the horns and told him about the object of our mission—the vase. And he will give it to us—upon one condition."

"What?" I exclaimed eagerly.

"That we go to the empress' palace at Pekin and, as a deputation, thank her for the honor which she has bestowed upon him."

"Why should he select two foreigners?" I asked suspiciously.

"Because," answered my companion, "we are to go in the guise of emissaries from the British government. You must know that it was the favor of Great Britain alone which has prevented him from having been put to death long ago. Now the yellow cord is the symbol of promotion, yellow being the royal color of China, and we are to take back the cord as a symbol of the prince's gratitude, at the same time conveying a quiet hint that the British government finds the promotion peculiarly pleasant."

I began to see. Twisted as it was, the Chinese mind seemed, at the bottom, much the same as ours. I could imagine an American, under such customs, resorting to much the same strategy.

"Yes, our presence will be at once an acknowledgment and a threat," said Nikolai. "I, of course, shall be the leader of the deputation and you my subordinate."

"And the vase?" I asked.

"The vase?" asked Nikolai of the prince.

The Brother of the Moon looked up and gabbled off something.

"He says it will be here within three days," said Nikolai. "I have told him frankly that we must have the duplicate of Prince Soltykoff's. We shall remain here until its arrival—and take it with us."

On the fourth day the vase arrived, and with that my skepticism departed. For this was, in very truth, the duplicate of the peach-blow vase which Soltykoff had showed us. Surely none but the skilled Chinese artificer could have made two vases so similar. There was the same iridescent surface, the same delicate dimensions, the same fading, appearing, translucent glow. Indeed, had the two been placed side by side, I doubt whether I could have told one from the other.

And with the arrival of the vase came a couple of magnificent palanquins and a whole retinue of servants. We were attired in silken robes; costly gifts were showered upon us, and at last we set off again along the road to Pekin, in very different style from that which we had displayed when we departed.

The report of our mission had evidently spread among the natives, for everywhere we found crowds lining the roads, strewing them with flowers, laughing and kow-towing and beating drums; the whole countryside was en fete for us. But little did we care for these things, for in an inside pocket of Nikolai's superb sable cloak reposed the peach-blow vase.

Thus, in royal state, we entered Pekin, and lodged in the west wing of the empress' palace. It was a city in itself—a fair city set among splendid gardens, through whose blossoming cherry trees I saw the maidens of the court strolling among rustic bridges and little trout brooks.

"Well, Nikolai," I said that evening, "at last we have achieved fame and riches. That was the oddest experience I ever encountered—and we semed to happen in at the psychological moment."

He flushed a little and looked at me guiltily.

"Did you notice that they seemed to make more fuss over you than over me?" he asked, in tones of evident annoyance.

"Well, you got honor enough," I retorted, jumping into bed—for, at Nikolai's request, they had assigned the same quarters to both of us.

He made no answer. I spoke to him once or twice, but, though I knew from his uneven breathing that he was not asleep, I could not draw a word from him. At last I fell into an untroubled slumber, from which I was awakened by a servitor, who brought me a golden ewer in which to wash my hands. Then I received my first surprise. In place of the silks and furs in which I had been attired, I saw beside me a plain, low-necked linen garment, whiter than snow. And white, I knew, was the color of death in China.

I looked around for Nikolai. To my surprise his bed was empty.

It was impossible to make the servant understand my questions. To all my attempts to frame them in the smattering of the Chinese tongue that I had acquired, he only bowed and smiled, until at last, resigning my impossible attempt, I dressed myself. Then, feeling uncommonly like a man in a nightgown, I followed the yellow man out of the apartment, which was on the ground floor, along a passage, to where a closed conveyance much like a sedan chair awaited me. I stepped in, the door was closed upon me, and four unseen runners took up the poles and hurried me through the streets of the imperial city within the walls.

By this time Nikolai's absence had begun to alarm me. I fidgeted within the stuffy chair; I was upon the point of attempting to leap out when we stopped and the door was suddenly flung open. I stepped down—into a wide courtyard that seemed to form part of the Chinese quarter of Pekin. All around me, thronging and jostling against the Chinese soldiers who kept them back, were thousands of the lowest rabble in Pekin. And in a long line that stretched from one side of the square to the other, were kneeling men, their faces turned to the ground, their hands bound behind their backs.

Even yet the significance of this scene had not begun to dawn upon me. But while I still hesitated beside the chair I was seized from behind and flung violently forward upon my face. In a trice my hands were bound behind my back, and my ankles were fastened, so that I was as helpless as the wretches whom I had watched the moment previously. Then, while I still knelt there, I saw a man step swiftly forth from among the crowd, a sword in his right hand. He raised it aloft one moment, brought it down—and at a blow severed the victim's head from his shoulders. Before the body had fallen he had wiped the weapon and taken up his stand beside the next victim.

After that I looked no more.

There had been nine men between myself and the executioner, and now there were but three. Hitherto I had remained in a condition of paralysis. Terror had completely unnerved me, and I was conscious only of the gaping crowd that pressed nearer and ever nearer, driving in upon me—of their cruel eyes and evil screams, of the dreadful, hissing sword, of the cold and mechanical advance of the man who wielded it. But now all at once I lifted up my eyes and saw that a little group had formed before me. And one of them I knew, clothed though he was in Chinese silks and furs. It was Nikolai himself! I knew him, and he knew that I recognized him.

Then the rage that rose up within my breast impelled me to make one last, supreme effort for life. The executioner was only two victims away. With a wild, convulsive, desperate attempt I snapped the bonds that bound my hands, half rose, fell over, rose again, and, still hobbled around the ankles, stumbled, hopping, toward the crowd. And the executioner was only one victim away!

They broke before me. Then they turned back. They surrounded me, mocking and gibing, pushing me with their heads and shoulders back toward where the executioner, having disposed of his last victim, stood calmly waiting. But at that instant I saw a disturbance among the mob. Heads of men appeared, high above the rest; then horses, plunging and struggling through, their chests heaving, their heads tossing beneath the reins. A moment later I saw the most welcome sight that has ever crossed my vision—a squadron of armed and mounted men. Even as the sword flashed over my head they rode the executioner down and, forming round me, held me within their ranks, swooning, but still conscious that Death's hand had been stayed.

The next thing that I remember was finding myself upon a straw bed inside the prison hospital. At my side sat a police officer—the same whom I had seen riding between me and the sword of the executioner.

"Feeling better?" he asked kindly. "The magistrates will grant you a private hearing before sending you for trial."

"Trial?" I cried. "Are you going to put me on trial for having escaped being murdered? Let me tell you one thing—the sooner I get out of China the happier I will be."

"Have you an attorney?" he asked quietly. "I must caution you that anything you say will be used against you by the prosecution." He waited a moment and then burst out:

"I can understand your trying to steal the vase, but what in thunder induced you to offer yourself to the executioner in place of Prince Tsin Tsai? Tell me, for the love of heaven, and not a word shall pass my lips."

"Either you are dreaming or I am," I retorted. "Suppose you tell me what I am accused of."

"Well," said the officer, dryly, "after stealing the vase——"

"What vase? The prince's vase?"

"What prince?" the officer replied, passing his hand wearily across his forehead. "I mean the peach-blow vase of Mr. Soltykoff."

"Steal?" I yelled. "I never had an opportunity to steal it."

"Now let me tell you the facts," replied the officer soothingly. "Mr. Soltykoff sent you and your companion upon some commission to Prince Tsin Tsai's palace. Four days after you had departed he discovered that his peach-blow vase, which he values at an impossible amount, had been stolen and replaced by a substitute. The authorities were informed, and I was commissioned to take a squad of troopers and follow you into the interior, and not to come back until I had you. You know the government never lets up on criminals in China—they can't afford to. We tracked you to Prince Tsin Tsai's palace, and there we discovered, to our amazement, that you had voluntarily offered yourself as a substitute for the headsman."

"What?" I cried in amazement. "Why—how——?"

"The prince had just received the yellow cord, signifying that he was expected to commit suicide at the earliest convenient moment. While he was sitting in his house, the fatal dagger hidden in his sleeve, surrounded by his weeping women folk, you and your companion broke in in some mysterious way, and you offered to suffer the death penalty in his place, as the Chinese law allows. Why, your heroism is the talk of China. It is rare enough in these days to find a Chinaman who is willing to die for his prince—but you, a foreigner! They talked of erecting a temple to you. They put you in a palanquin and conveyed you to the empress' palace, that she might gaze upon this prodigy, and I believe she looked on you through a hole in a screen as you were taken out. I believe that the court Gazette has ennobled your family for three generations back. But I concluded that you were crazy. However, my duty was to follow and apprehend you, because you had stolen the vase. It was no task of mine to inquire into your motives.

"Well, they lodged you in the palace and paid you the highest honors possible. Then, when your time came, they took you to the public execution ground for the decapitation. But all this while I and my troop were hurrying into Pekin to stop the spectacle, because, under the treaty, English justice takes precedence over Chinese.

"You seem to have behaved admirably until you saw the executioner, and then, the natives say, you became scared. It was a sad throw-down for them. Many a worthy citizen had brought his offspring to the execution ground to impress them with a lesson in fortitude. But you spoiled it all by struggling. However, that prolonged matters a trifle, and I got there in the nick of time and rescued you. After you've done your time you can go back and be put to death if you want to."

"But I don't want to," I shouted. "I thought I was going to Pekin upon a private mission from the Brother of the Moon, and that the yellow cord was the sign of honor, and he gave me his own peach-blow vase as a reward."

"Tell that to the magistrate," said the police officer, dryly. "Now, if you are ready, we will appear before him in his chambers."

He led me across the prison courtyard to the hall of justice, and, entering by a side door, ushered me up two flights of stairs to the magistrate's rooms. When we entered I saw a short, stout, jolly-looking man upon a chair at a desk—and, at his side—Nikolai!

He started forward and grasped me warmly by the hands. There was nothing upon his face but a friend's welcome.

"I have explained all to the magistrate," he cried. "And now, Summers, he has given me permission to repeat the process with you.

"I own that I deceived you as to the nature of our mission to Pekin. Yes, the truth is that I bargained with the prince to receive the peach-blow vase in exchange for your life. I sold you as a substitute to the executioner. But all the while I knew that troops were upon our path and that we would be rescued. I own I ran my calculations close. But I succeeded—and let the measure of that success serve to restore our friendship."

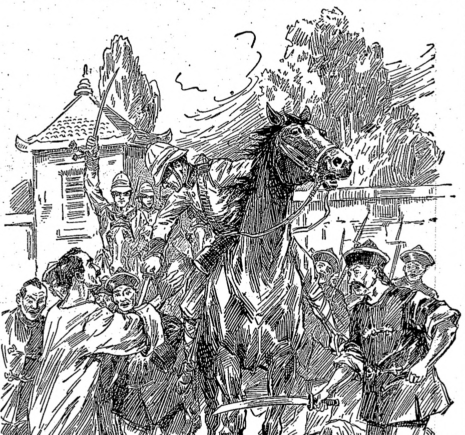
"If you had failed I should be dead," I said bitterly.

I knew he lied. I knew that he had sold my life for the peach-blow vase as cheerfully as though I had been no more to him than the old prince whom I had seen working his claw-like fingers among the rich stuffs of his gown and playing with the silken cord.

"Well," said the magistrate cheerfully, "you gentlemen ran your calculations fine, but you forgot one thing. A Chinaman is as good as a Caucasian at a horse-deal, and especially in swapping vases. As you may see by now, he never gave you his vase at all."

"I saw it," I cried. "I handled it."

"You handled Mr. Soltykoff's vase," said the magistrate, laughing. "As soon as you had described it he sent for the most expert thief in Pekin and had it stolen and brought to him. He bought his life with Mr. Soltykoff's property. However, the vase has since been restored. Let me suggest that when you go bargain hunting again beware of Chinese princes with yellow cords."



HEADS OF MEN APPEARED, HIGH ABOVE THE REST.

TEACH RULES OF CONDUCT

Bureau of Education Has Far-Reaching Aims in Instructing Children of the Philippines.

The latest publication of the Bureau of Education at Manila is an elaborate treatise on "good manners and good conduct for use in primary grades." It represents an entirely new colonial experiment—an attempt to use the rules of etiquette as a civilizing force. Filipino children are learning not only the English language, reading, writing, geography and the other branches; they are not only forming a first-hand acquaintance with American history, the Pilgrim Fathers, Abraham Lincoln, the Constitution and such accepted authors as Longfellow and Hawthorne; they are learning also the proper way to raise their hats to ladies, to go up and down stairs in the most approved fashion, to sit and stand and walk according to the accepted code, to behave with dignity and courtesy in all the social crises of life.

Though the parents of most of the children dispense with table utensils at their meals and convey food to their mouths with their fingers, no Filipino boy or girl can go through the primary grades without acquiring a complete education in the use of knife, fork and spoon. A graduate of this department, if he profits by his instruction, will never use toothpicks in public, never tuck his napkin into his bosom, never reach across the table for the salt, nor emphasize the strong points in his conversation by wild gesticulations with his knife. He will always say "please" when making a request, respond "don't mention it" when thanked for a small personal attention, never leave a room without asking to be excused, always rise when a lady enters, and never pass in front of people without a polite "pardon me."

All this instruction is given, not academically, but graphically and concretely. Good manners are taught in the form of set dialogues and little one-act plays. Selected children enact the several roles of father, mother, teacher, son, daughter and the other everyday social characters.—The World's Work.

Problem of the Debutante.

At this time of the year many parents are making arrangements to introduce their daughters in society. The long and costly period of incubation is ended, says the Philadelphia Ledger. The girl has returned from a fashionable "finishing school" or from a tour abroad, and she is now ready—albeit with trepidation—to cross the threshold into the scintillating ballroom and beyond that into a world of pleasure and of pain, of singular follies and sad sincerities, of false friends and true counselors. But what of the immediate process of initiation? Is the present exhausting ordeal, from the autumnal housewarming to the sackcloth of lenten penitence, anything more than a nerve racking, sleep destroying charivari of vulgar ostentation and a hectic, frantic flurry to keep pace with the procession? What useful end is subserved by this mad rout of overlapping gayeties that burns the candle at both ends and reduces a maiden, who should be buoyant and radiant and beautiful in spirit and in health, to a shadow—blase, anemic and lethargic—of her former charming self?

Fastest Speed Made by Man.

Undoubtedly the fastest speed on the earth was made by Burman in an automobile at Daytonia, Fla., April 23, 1911, when he went a mile in 25.4 seconds. Ninety miles an hour has been approached by several in both automobiles and motorcycles. Aviators have exceeded 100 miles an hour. But such speed is insignificant when we consider that we are all traveling at the rate of 1,000 miles and more an hour by the daily revolution of the earth, and that, too, is insignificant when we consider that the earth is traveling through space at the rate of 375,000,000 miles a year, or nearly 43,000 an hour.

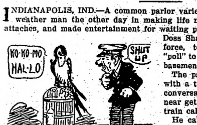
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Screeching of Parrot Upsets Dignity of Station

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—A common parlor variety of poll parrot assisted the weather man the other day in making life miserable for terminal station attaches, and made entertainment for waiting passengers at the station until Doss Shaffer, actor and station police force, took a hand and relegated "poll" to the deep, dark recesses of the basement.



The parrot was a verbose "critter" with a tendency to butt in on all the conversation he heard, and he came near getting the goat of George Stout, train caller.

He came into the station with Calvin Bookaw, who was waiting for a car to New Albany. The cars were running irregularly and Bookaw was compelled to wait for some time. Poll voiced displeasure at the delay until he tired himself out with squawking at nothing in particular.

Then he cocked his head on one side and took an interest in Stout, who was calling the cars in a big, booming voice.

Stout was shouting "Awl-a-board f'r Greenwood, Whiteland, Franklin, Amity, Edinburg, Taylorsville, Columbus," etc., when poll took offense.

"Ark! Squawk!!" he screeched in a shrill mezzo-soprano.

Stout gave him a look of cold disgust. Poll cocked a glassy eye in Stout's direction and screamed, "Hallo, hallo!"

Stout started another spiel—"Awl-a-board for Car-mel, Nobles-ville, Cicero, Arcadia, Atlanta, Tip-ton, Jackson, Sharpsville, Fair-field, Kokomo——"

"Ko-ko-mo," trilled polly. "Awk—hallo."

Stout started to call an Anderson car. He got half way down the list when poll sang out, "Kokomo!"

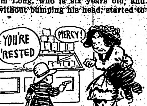
"Awk, hallo—and Kokomo," chirruped the bird. The passengers giggled. Stout grew hot under the collar and started another spiel. He was fairly well along when poll butted in again with "—and Kokomo."

Stout became "flustered." He called Doss Shaffer and ordered him to subdue the bird.

"Hallo," said poll to the cop. Doss knows how to pet a dog and handle a drunk, but he couldn't do anything with the parrot. It screamed every time Stout started to call a car, until finally Doss, as a last resort, took the bird and its cage to the basement. The last thing it said as it started down the stairs was "— and Kokomo."

Smallest Policeman Is Arrested by a Woman

CLEVELAND, O.—With all the dignity of a London bobby or one of Kaiser Wilhelm's schutzmenn, Charles William Long, who is six years old, and who can walk under a dining room table without bumping his head, started to arrest all the customers in a downtown department store the other day. He was dressed like a "sure nuff" policeman, badge, club, pistol, brass buttons and all, and when he waved his cap pistol at a woman she ran.



"Wait a minute," called Charles William. "Stand still an' be 'rested. How'm I goin' to 'rest you if you run?" and he tapped the shield on his swelling chest.

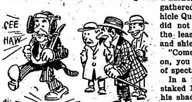
The attention of Mrs. Sarah Dunleavey, store detective, was attracted by the commotion and she picked Charles Williams up in her arms and carried him over to the old court house. There she turned him over to Probation Officer Lewis.

"Why did you let this woman arrest you if you are a policeman?" he was asked.

"Huh, she jest picked me up an' lugged me over here. I did think of 'restin' her, but she's too big, an' besides I don't 'rest women. I jest 'rest bad men."

Man Plays Horse in Street and Lands in Cell

CHICAGO.—"Giddap!—whoa!—gee!—haw!" yelled John P. Quin, thirty-eight years old, 921 Wells street, as he galloped and pranced up and down Hill street early the other morning with a harness over his shoulders. Crowds gathered, wondering what sort of vehicle Quin thought he was drawing. He did not seem to mind spectators in the least, however. He trotted, ran and shied.



"Come on, you Silverheels! Come on, you Silverheels!" called a couple of spectators.

In a moment bets flew. One man staked 100 to 1 that Quin would beat his shadow by a nose, another laid a 10-to-1 shot that he could beat his coat-tails. The man who wagered that he soon would beat a retreat won all the money. Because——

Just then police of the Chicago avenue station arrived and for a moment did not know what to make of it. Finally deciding that the man should be arrested, they took him to the station, and he was charged with appearing in public disguised as a horse.

"I guess he had been playing with the kid," volunteered somebody, "and thinks the small boy is still driving him."

Cat Shower Is Big Feature of Fire in Milwaukee

MILWAUKEE, WIS.—"Merowrr, ps-ss-sss-t, scat, thud!! Owow-wr-wr, pssst, spit, spit, thud!!" These sounds, which cause neighbors to heave a boot at the back fence simply through force of habit, though it was broad daylight, combined with the arrival of fire apparatus, startled residents in the vicinity of Farwell avenue and Kenilworth place shortly after three o'clock on a recent afternoon.

A fire is an exciting thing, anyway, and even paterfamilias, enjoying the day of rest with a pipe and the Sunday paper on the davenport, gets up to see the apparatus go by.

This particular fire was not only exciting; it was unique. Miss Sarah Hathaway, a kindly old lady living at 431 Farwell avenue, conducts a home for cats at her house. She feeds and takes care of about 100 felines of all descriptions. Accordingly, when an oil stove in the cellar set fire to rubbish collected in the basement, and smoke filled the upper rooms, pandemonium reigned among the cat lodgers.

With the arrival of engine company No. 27 and truck company No. 5 the work of rescue was started. It was unnecessary to carry the rescued down a ladder. Firemen simply grabbed the tabbies and toms by the scruff of the neck and heaved them out of the window, thereby being responsible for the noises referred to above.

Miss Hathaway wished to have one big Maltese cat saved in preference to all the rest, and offered a dollar to the fireman that would bring it out. The cat was obdurate, however.

TALENTED YOUNG MATRON

New York, Boston, Chicago and the most densely populated cities are familiar with the type of woman best represented by Miss Mabel Boardman, head of the Red Cross, and now by Mrs. Joseph Medill McCormick, who has taken over the national protection of the suffrage cause. Miss Boardman is a dominant figure socially and under the Taft administration presided over the nearest resemblance to a salon of the eighteenth century the capital has enjoyed. Mrs. McCormick has resided at varying intervals in Washington since she wore short gowns and still attended school. She was well known as her father's pride and occasional counsellor in the early days of President McKinley's regime. She passed from the school girl role to that of a debutante popular with all classes of people. Social honors soon palled on this talented young matron, and ten years ago she became actively interested in various philanthropic schemes in Washington and Chicago. Two years ago she began the erection of a series of lodging houses for self-respecting working girls.

To supervise this task, Mrs. McCormick took a course in practical architecture and visited in person the great central cities, where similar experiments had been conducted.

AMERICAN, YET TYPICALLY SPANISH

C. HARRIS & EWING

An American woman who looks enough like a Spaniard to be mistaken for a native Castilian is the Senora Alicia Ward Riano y Gayangos, wife of the Spanish ambassador to this country. It is a strange coincidence—a quirk of fate as it were—that she should resemble so markedly in coloring and feature the countrywomen of her foreign-born husband. Every one, she says, is amazed when she acknowledges the United States as her birthplace and fatherland.

This country has much to be proud of when it views the senora, despite the fact that her exotic type reflects credit upon another clime. She first impresses one as being a mere girl, yet upon her youthful shoulders rest the responsibilities of an embassy. She is one of the most popular and efficient chatelaines of the entire diplomatic corps. This is due, perhaps, to another of her personal qualities, that reveals itself after she had been engaged in conversation for some little time. She has a great amount of what might be called forceful spontaneity. In other words, she is delightfully enthusiastic about the joys and beauties of life and does not hesitate to express her pleasure; but balancing this youthful enthusiasm of hers is a well-developed interest in serious matters.

SAW TO IT HIMSELF

Representative Heflin of Alabama told the following story on a couple of Texans, and insisted that it was true, even if they were from the sunny south:

"It was at the time of the inauguration last March, and these men were casting about for some place to get something to eat. They finally ventured into Washington's most expensive hotel. Being a trifle awkward with a menu, the waiter presently began suggesting.

"'Duck, sah?'

"'Yes, Henry, let's have duck. I ain't et duck since I wuz a boy, and this is on me, remember—'

"'Duck, by all means, waiter; but this bill, Bill, is on me. We'll have quail, too, waiter. Got some quail?'

"'Yessah, and will yoh gemmen have soup while these is bein' prepahed? Oyster soup, sah?'

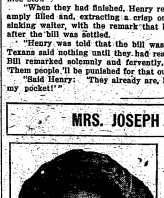
"'Yes—yes, we will, we'll have a nice stew—'

"When they had finished, Henry reached in his pocket, took out a wallet amply filled and, extracting a crisp one-dollar bill, handed it to the almost sinking waiter, with the remark that he could have what was left out of it after the bill was settled.

"Henry was told that the bill was $9.65. Being men of few words, the Texans said nothing until they had reached Pennsylvania avenue. And then Bill remarked solemnly and fervently, as he looked at the upper windows, 'Them people 'll be punished for that outrage!'

"Said Henry: 'They already are, Bill. Feel them dozen silver spoons in my pocket!'"

MRS. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL



C. HARRIS & EWING

Like President Wilson, Mrs. Joseph E. Ransdell of Louisiana has tried out the number 13 and found it lucky.

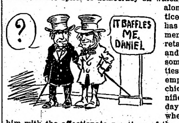
"To show you I always know what a good number it is," says the wife of Senator Ransdell, "I will tell you that I came into the world as the thirteenth child of my parents. In that day and time, it was held as a lucky number of children for parents to have. So, at any rate, I had the advantage of not regarding it with superstitious awe in my childhood."

Mrs. Ransdell is the recently elected treasurer general of the Daughters of the American Revolution. She spends two mornings each week in her offices at Continental Memorial hall at Washington. Here, the Tennessee, Maryland and California rooms are given over for the transaction of the large amount of business that passes through her hands, and she has a staff of nine efficient clerks. Every penny of the thousands of dollars disbursed annually by the great patriotic society is handled by Mrs. Ransdell, and the office is one that calls for business and executive ability.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Note That Was Signed by Webster and Clay

WASHINGTON.—What always charms one about Washington is to realize that, after all, men are human, and that no dignity or distinction can eliminate the spirit of democracy on which the republic is founded. To walk along and have a chat with Chief Justice White and find that the man who has written decisions of historic moment from which there is no appeal retains an interest in everyday affairs and wears a fuzzy hat, and about the some sort of clothes, shoes and neckties as any other man, only serves to emphasize his real dignity. The chief justice is as simple as he is dignified. He loves to spend his vacation days at the old home in Louisiana, where neighbors and friends still hail him with the affectionate greetings of the days when he was forging his way to the front as a promising young lawyer.



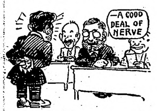
The men in official Washington seem to have less of a halo about them than in the good old days, when the towering form of Webster or Henry Clay would attract more attention on Pennsylvania avenue than a brass band or a tango dancer in 1914. In a bank the other day was shown a note indorsed jointly by Henry Clay and Daniel Webster. The story is told that Clay asked Webster to indorse a note with him for $500.

"All right," said the studious and thoughtful Webster, "I'll do so, Clay, if you'll make it $1,000 and give me half." Clay agreed to the compact, and the two set out for Banker Riggs, signed the note with due solemnity, and secured the proceeds. As they swung out across the threshold on to the avenue and divided the money, Webster in his ponderous voice remarked to Clay, "Henry, why do you suppose Mr. Riggs wanted our names on that note?"

"It baffles me, Daniel," responded Clay, "perhaps he desired some memento to hand down to posterity, for I cannot at this moment conceive how it is going to be paid by the present generation."—National Magazine.

Bachelor Member of House Embarrassed by Plea

REPRESENTATIVE MOSES KINKAID of Nebraska, a bachelor, was embarrassed in the house the other day. He was almost obliged to agree to get married in order to secure the passage of "a bill providing that the marriage of a homestead entryman to a homestead entrywoman shall not impair the right of either to a patent, after compliance with the law for one year."



—A GOOD DEAL OF NERVE

Mr. Kinkaid said the present laws are an impediment to marriage in the public land states, and that this condition of affairs should be no longer tolerated.

"The gentleman from Nebraska has a good deal of nerve to call this bill up," suggested Representative Mann of Illinois. "He says it is against public policy to prevent marriage, while the gentleman all his life has been preventing one marriage that ought to take place."

Mr. Kinkaid blushed and stuttered and then exclaimed haltingly:

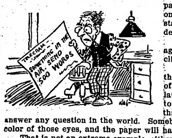
"I think I can make up for this omission, dereliction, or lack of opportunity, by helping to promote a law of this kind."

"We should like to help the gentleman get married," said Mr. Mann.

"I will accept all help gratefully," replied Mr. Kinkaid.

About the Easiest Thing in the World to Say

"ASK Washington," is the phrase that makes the corps of correspondents at the national capital ill. It is the easiest thing in the world to say, and sometimes entails endless labor. It means that somewhere in this country a paper is going to press, and some one on that sheet wants to know, for instance, what was the color of President Arthur's eyes.



TELEGRAM — SOMETHING IN THE AIR. SEND 500 WORDS

"Ask Washington," says the managing editor, and the telegraph editor clicks off the massage.

The Washington correspondent gets the query. It may arrive in the middle of the night, or it may arrive even later, but he has to answer it in order to preserve the inviolate reputation that a Washington newspaper man can answer any question in the world. Somebody in this town will remember the color of those eyes, and the paper will have it.

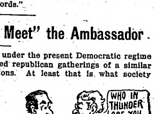
That is not an extreme example, either. Didn't one Washington bureau get a query not long ago, in the "wee sma" hours of the morning, asking the number of steel missiles aboard one of the battleships. How would you like to get that problem put up to you at 1 a. m. with the understanding that the answer had to be fired back instanter?

Another query, from a Canadian paper, asked for the number of employes out of work in nearly every big city in the Union, the cost of clothes and food in all those cities and the probable effect on general business. Another query asked a correspondent here, "Who is Coup d'Etat and where is he from?" The correspondent had been using French in his political stuff. One of the most famous queries came from a yellow sheet in a big city. It read:

"Something in the air. Send 500 words."

Senator Martine "Glad to Meet" the Ambassador

SOCIAL affairs in congressional circles under the present Democratic regime lack the formality which characterized republican gatherings of a similar character under preceding administrations. At least that is what society people in Washington say, and they are telling a good story on Senator James E. Martine of New Jersey to illustrate their point.



WHO IN THUNDER ARE YOU ?

At a reception given by the senator not long ago, so the story goes, members of the diplomatic corps, with their gold braid and medals of honor, mingled with the more modestly dressed civilians. Senator Martine was circling the room, greeting his guests in his bluff, hearty way, when his glance happened to rest on the Spanish ambassador, gaily caparisoned in uniform of his rank.

"Who in thunder are you? Where in thunder do you come from?" said Senator Martine in his characteristically explosive manner.

Somewhat abashed by the senator's frank question and boldness of expression, the ambassador managed to stammer out:

"I am Senor Don Juan Riano y Gayangos, chamberlain to his majesty the king of Spain, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from that country."

Senator Martine's nerve never has been known to fail him in an emergency and it stood him in good stead in this instance.

"Well, by gad, sir," he replied, extending his hand cordially, "I'm glad to meet you."

WILSON'S PLEA TO BE HEEDED, LIKELY REPEAL OF CANAL TOLLS IS FREELY PREDICTED BY LEADERS.

DECISIVE VICTORY WANTED

Bill of Senator Owen in Senate Puts Question Before Interoceanic Committee—Two Are to Switch.

Washington, March 16. — Administration leaders in the senate and house set themselves for a quick and decisive fight over the proposed repeal of the toll exemption clause of the Panama canal act, confident that President Wilson's plea for reversal of policy would be heeded.

Repeal Bill in Senate.

In the senate, after informal conferences of Democratic leaders and a talk with President Wilson, Senator Owen of Oklahoma introduced a repeal bill similar to the Sims bill pending in the house in order to have the issue placed immediately and squarely before the committee on interoceanic canals.

It also was determined to hasten consideration of the measure by this committee in order that it may be ready for action in the senate as soon as it is disposed of in the house. Representative Adamson, chairman of the house committee on interstate Commerce, who is leading the fight for the president's plea in the lower body, conferred with senators during the day, giving assurances that the repeal bill would be passed by a comfortable margin.

Senate leaders were actuated to begin vigorous action before the house completes its work on the matter because of a realization that while ultimate passage of the repeal is assured, there will be a hard fight on the committee on interoceanic canals which has jurisdiction over the bill.

Senator Owen, a majority member of that committee, took the initiative, Senator O'Gorman, the chairman, and some other Democratic members being opposed to the repeal.

Senator O'Gorman, who now is out of the city, will return on Monday to find an insistent demand for taking up the Owen bill and also the compromise bill submitted by Senator Chilton, another member of the committee, which would empower the president to assess tolls against the American coastwise vessels.

Promise Support of President.

Among the Democrats on the committee that voted for toll exemption who have assured the president that they would support the repeal are Senator Thornton, the ranking member, and Senator Simmons, of North Carolina. Senator Chilton also is counted upon by the administration leaders to vote for a flat repeal measure, since the president has declared that there must be no compromise in settling the issue.

Senator Walsh, of Montana, who fought for toll exemption, has declared himself open to conviction, but as yet has made no announcement of any intention to change his views.

Republican members of the committee also are divided. In any event the action of the committee on the Owen bill is expected to be close. Should the majority report the bill unfavorably, Senator Owen and other of the minority will submit a minority report upon which the senate will be asked to act.

Must be Settled Soon.

"No matter what action the committee may take," said Senator Owen, "this is a matter that must be settled and there is no reason for delay. The house has determined upon a program and should there be any delay there we should be ready to proceed in the senate."

Much discussion prevailed in the senate yesterday as to the outcome of the issue, it being generally conceded that the repeal bill would pass. Claims that it would be adopted by a majority of about 50 were not accepted, however, by the conservative leaders, who predicted that the majority in favor of the repeal would not exceed ten.

ELEANOR WILSON TO WED

Washington, March 16.—"The president and Mrs. Wilson announce the engagement of their youngest daughter, Eleanor Randolph, to William Gibbs McAdoo."

This announcement was issued at the White House by Secretary Tumulty after a very busy day of speculation in capital official and social circles over the prospects for another White House wedding in June.

The date of the wedding is not known, but it is generally believed that it will be some time in June.

Inventor's Funeral is Held.

New York, March 16.—The funeral of George Westinghouse was held at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church. The officiating clergymen at the church were J. H. Jewett, pastor of the church, and Rev. F. J. Fisher of Pittsburg. The latter delivered the address and also officiated at the grave in Woodlawn cemetery, where the burial, which was private, took place. Dr. Fisher became an intimate friend of Mr. Westinghouse when the latter first went to Pittsburg.

1,500 RUSSIANS ARE KILLED

LATEST ESTIMATE OF DEATHS IN TERRIBLE HURRICANE.

Five Hundred Miles Along Shore of Sea of Azov Flooded by Waterspouts.

St. Petersburg, March 17. — Details of the hurricane which swept the province of Kuban, Southern Russia, Saturday, have been received here from Ekaterinodar. A northerly gale caused numerous water spouts off the east coast of the Sea of Azov and the shore from Yoisk to the Strait of Kertsch, a distance of about 500 miles, was flooded and six villages damaged.

One hundred and seventy-six construction employes of the Kuban railway were awakened by the storm and fled to a train and endeavored to escape. Soon, however, the engine and cars were overturned by the rushing waters and swept away.

The hurricane raged for 10 hours.

When it ceased the receding floods revealed scenes of destruction. Eight miles of the railway embankment were in ruin. The wrecked train was covered with the bodies of the dead workmen. Forty-eight of the 176 men finally got to shore on floating wreckage, but it is feared all the others were drowned.

Many courageous rescues of persons floating on wreckage on the sea have been reported. Many bodies have been washed ashore at various points.

The meagre dispatches received reported that 1,500 lives had been lost as a result of the storm, but no reliable details giving what may be term an accurate estimate have yet been obtained.

LIFE OF JUDGE THREATENED

Probe of Election Frauds at Terre Haute, Ind., Causing Much Trouble.

Indianapolis, March 14.—David Masterson, who became known as a slugger during the local street car strike, has been arrested here at the request of Terre Haute, Ind., authorities. He is charged in an affidavit issued in Terre Haute with an attempt to kill Felix Blanenbaker, the special judge who presided over the election fraud case there recently. He has been sent to Terre Haute.

Masterson when taken to the county jail was asked why he was wanted in Terre Haute.

"Oh, I've been trying to keep Mayor Donn Roberts of Terre Haute from going to the penitentiary," he replied jokingly, "and now I suppose I'll get a chance to go there myself."

Earl Dickens is held in jail in Terre Haute, unable to furnish a bond of $25,000 on an indictment charging him with conspiracy to dynamite the homes of Judges Charles M. Fortune, Special Judge Blankenbaker and Joseph Roach, special prosecutors in the election cases.

VAGRANT ARMY ENJOYS LIFE

Men Bask in Sun at Expense of Unions—Verbal Order Is Withdrawn by Citizens.

Sacramento, Cal., March 16.—While the authorities of Sacramento and Yolo counties argued over their disposition, members of "General" Kelly's army of the unemployed, which started from San Francisco for Washington, basked in the sunshine, fished from the Yolo levee, and enjoyed an abundance of food supplied by the labor unions of Sacramento.

The Sacramento citizens committee withdrew its verbal offer to furnish transportation for a distance of 50 miles to members of the army, and the Sacramento district attorney vetoed any move toward assisting in the internal affairs of another county.

These actions left Yolo county without the money or men to enforce its ultimatum delivered Thursday night that the unemployed must be moved.

Mansion Burned to Ground.

Glasgow, Scotland, March 14.—Militant suffragettes burned to the ground a large unoccupied mansion at Stewarton, belonging to the Free church of Scotland. A message was left in the vicinity stating, "This is in revenge for the brutal arrest of Mrs. Pankhurst."

6-Year-Old Travels 200,000 Miles.

San Francisco, March 14.—Four of little Luther Angel's six years of life have been spent in almost constant travel, and he is claiming the record as a boy globe-trotter. He arrived from Honolulu, completing his second journey around the warld. In all he has traveled 200,000 miles.

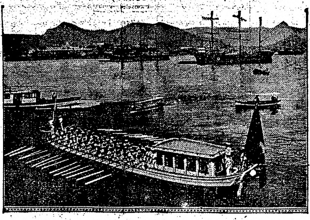
Historic German Church Burns.

Duesseldorf, Germany, March 16.—The famous thirteenth century church of St. Quirinus at Neuss, four miles from here, burst into fames early Saturday and the greater part of the edifice was quickly destroyed.

Work on New Haven Plan.

Washington, March 16.—Success or failure of the plan for a peaceful dissolution of the New Haven railroad system hinges largely on two propositions, the length of service of the trustees, who it is proposed shall take over the stock of the Boston & Maine railroad, now owned by the New Haven, and the divorce or retention of the systems Connecticut trolley lines. After an all-day conference it became known that no agreement had been reached on either proposition.

HARBOR OF RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL



Rio de Janeiro and other Brazilian cities have been proclaimed in a state of siege by the national authorities, owing to the outbreak of revolutionary troubles. In this photograph of the harbor of Rio the president's state barge is seen in the foreground.

FIRE SWEEPS SIX PORTLAND BLOCKS

WATER FRONT DESTROYED AND LOSS IS OVER MILLION.

DOCKS AND SHIPS BURNED

Spectacular Scenes Enacted When Burning Vessel Is Cut Loose and Conflagration Spreads Along the Shore.

Portland, Ore., March 14.—Fire that swept six square blocks, destroying all property on the east water front between the north and south Albina ferries, with a total loss exceeding $1,000,000, started in the Columbia dock, devouring stores of sulphur, oil, liquid asphalt and sending volumes of varicolored flame aloft, the firemen fighting against the fumes arising from the burning chemicals.

Panic Reigns For Time.

Panic reigned along the water front, with tugboats steaming up to save the shipping, and sailors cutting loose all docked craft into the Williamette river. Open drawbridges delayed the arrival of fire department, and the flames were beyond control when the land apparatus got into action. The fireboat David Campbell worked from the river, but the fire swept landward.

The steamers Cricket and Glenroy, moored at Columbia dock No. 1 and Montgomery dock No. 2, caught fire. The Cricket came out of the Columbia and into the Williamette from San Francisco laden with asphalt during the night and tied up. Firemen, working through the burning docks to the water's edge, cut the Cricket loose and turned the ship into the river, but the ship, instead of turning outward, drifted along the docks then spreading the conflagration.

Dock Also Burns.

The Cricket drifted broadside along the Montgomery dock where the Glenroy lay, and the two steamers and the dock ignited. The dock burned to the piling, on the water front end.

Thirty-one Chinese sailors on the Glenroy got ashore and were taken in charge by the immigration officials, and the steamer, a steel boat, burned to her hull, her steel plates warping and cracking.

Alarmed lest the drifting Cricket carry the conflagration further, the fireboat David Campbell started in pursuit, the firemen on board not daring to approach too close to the burning ship. The Campbell caught the Cricket by a grappling line and towed her to midstream, but not until the Montgomery dock had been set on fire and was a mass of flames.

The police took the first mate of the Glenroy off that ship, where he lay with a broken arm and other injuries, and several injured Chinese sailors were rushed to hospitals.

Two English Women Missing.

London, March 14.—A dispatch to the Central News from Shanghai says that two English women attached to the station off the China inland mission at Lao Ho-Kow, in the province of Hu-Peh, have been missing since that own was sacked and burned by brigands. The two women are Miss E. Black and Miss J. Black. The China inland mission is a British missionary society with headquarters in London.

Hundreds of Lives Lost.

Washington, March 14.—An appeal for more money to combat famine and pestilence, which already has carried off hundreds of lives in Albania, has just been received at Red Cross headquarters.

Suffragettes to Jail.

London, March 16.—Two months in prison at hard labor was the punishment imposed in the Westminster police court on six militant suffragettes who smashed all the windows on the street floor of Home Secretary McKenna's home in Downing street. Before dawn the women, with long-handled hamemrs, raided the McKenna house and shattered the panes of every window they could reach. They made no attempt to run away and calmly submitted to arrest.

ECHO OF ST. LOUIS TRAGEDY

SUIT IS BROUGHT AGAINST ST. LOUIS CLUB.

Chicago Man, Whose Leg Was Broken During Fire, Asks $25,000.

St. Louis, Mo., March 16.—Charles Schimel of Chicago, whose leg was broken in dropping from a window of the Missouri Athletic club during the fire last Monday, has filed suit for $25,000 damages against the club and the Boatmen's bank, both of which occupied the building. His petition charges the fire ordinances were disregarded in that no rope or other fire escape was provided for him.

Scores of unsafe structures were found by the fire department during an inspection Friday. Included in these buildings are the municipal house of detention for children, an orphans' home, a convent, an exclusive social club, a large theater and several hotels.

Six bodies were taken from the ruins of the Missouri Athletic club bringing the total present number of dead recovered to 24. The bodies of six other fire victims still are in the ruins. It is probable the remaining bodies will be removed today. Seventeen of the dead taken out of the wreckage have been identified. The others are burned beyond recognition. Three of the bodies found have been identified as those of Allan Dow, J. L. Haenelen and John J. Ratz, all of this city.

The fire started in the dining room on the third floor, according to the story told Friday by Joseph Spezia, an employe of the club.

VAGRANTS TOLD TO DISPERSE

Seven Hundred Unemployed Will Be Dealt With Like Cattle If They Do Not Act Immediately.

Sacramento, Cal., March 14.—"Disperse at once," is the ultimatum issued by four California counties to the 700 unemployed who left San Francisco last week on a trans-continental march to Washington, D. C.

Although suffering from the pangs of hunger and the effects of cold, the "army" is defiant and declares it will not move until its leaders are released from jails and hospitals and until it is given transportation east.

The action decided upon by the authorities, if the men remain firm in their refusal to disperse, is to cut out bunches of 20, 30 or 50 men, as cowpunchers cut out bunches of cattle, herd them to the railway tracks and hundle them into cars. Firemen, policemen and armed deputy sheriffs will guard the bridges and prevent any attempt to escape.

Officials of Sacramento have offered the unemployed transportation to any point within a 50-mile radius of the county.

Heads Cracked in a Riot.

Dublin, March 16.—Leading a march on the lord mayor's home at the head of an army of the unemployed, James Robert White, formerly a captain in the army and a son of the late field marshal, Sir Stuart White, defender of Ladysmith, during the Boer war, met a baton charge of the police so fiercely that five accusations of assault were laid against him. These were made by a police inspector, a sergeant of police, two policemen, and the driver of a mail wagon.

Old Railroad Man Dies.

Chicago, March 14.—James W. Munn, assistant general passenger and ticket agent of the Chicago & Northwestern railroad, died suddenly here yesterday of heart disease. He had been with the road since 1879.

Bryan Will Sign Treaties.

Washington, March 16.—Secretary Bryan announces that in the near future he will sign at one sitting new peace treaties with Argentine, Brazil and Chili, embodying the idea of investigation of difficulties that otherwise might lead to war. Earlier, Ambassador Jusserand of France began negotiations with Mr. Bryan for such a treaty, and it is confidently expected by administration officials treaties of this kind will be signed with both of this kind will be signed with both France and Great Britain.

FATE OF TORREON RESTS IN BALANCE

BATTLE RAGES AROUND STRATEGICAL POINT FOR ITS POSSESSION.

REBELS WINNING THUS FAR

Federals Win First Skirmish, But This Is Due to Surprise—Villa Intercepted Wireless Dispatch to Huerta Forces at Start.

Chihuahua, Mex., March 17.—Fighting before Torreon, and it is believed that the final struggle, long deferred, for the possession of that strategical post is at hand.

The rebels are reported victorious in the battle, although the federals at first drove back a small force of Constitutionalists.

General Villa intercepted a wireless dispatch from Huerta at Mexico City to General Refugio Velasco commanding the federal garrison at Torreon, directing the latter to take the iniative against the Constitutionalists. Villa at once ordered a general advance.

Rebel Band Retreats.

Before the order could be obeyed, however, a federal force, moving westward from Mapimi through Canyon Lacadena, encountered a small Constitutionalist garrison, which retreated in disorder. Owing to its proximity to the federal outposts the canyon had not been strongly intrenched by the rebels.

General Urbina, with 3,000 men, at Palayo, nine Spanish leagues to the north, immediately was ordered to advance, and General Villa issued orders for the advance of all the cavalry at Escalon, Conejos, Peronal and other points along his battle front to the immediate northward of Torreon.

A late report from the front said General Aguierres Benevides had proceeded southward from Conejos, in response to General Villa's order to advance, and, encountering a large body of Federals south of Peronal, drove them into Bermijillo. Losses were not reported.

Special Train Sent.

A special train has been started for Juarez to bring General Filipe Angeles, secretary of war in the cabinet of Carranza, to Chihuahua to command the artillery, with Colonel Servia second in command.

General Villa is said to be impatient for the arrival of General Angeles in order that he may get to the scene of battle. He has suspended regular train service, as all rolling stock will be used for troop movement.

Priests Slain in War.

New Orleans.—Five priests have been slain by rebels in the Mexican state of Tamaulipas since Nov. 18 last, three are held for ransom, a convent has been burned and a cathedral and a smaller church looted, according to two Catholic priests, Father Jose Moreno Madina and Father Reymon Gonzales, who arrived here yesterday from Brownsville, Texas. Both said they had been driven from Victoria, Mexico.

ADMITTED TO PARCEL POST

Regulation Approved Permitting Many Farm Products For Short Distances.

Washington, March 17.—Postmaster General Burleson has approved an amendment to the parcel post regulations, under which butter, eggs, fruits, vegetables, poultry and other articles in parcels weighing from 20 to 50 pounds, may be shipped in the first and second zone, in boxes and crates similar to those handled by express companies.

The amendment provides that parcels weighing 20 pounds or less will be handled as heretofore and must be securely packed in "such manner as to be safely treated in bags with other matter."

Suffragettes "Plaster" Cathedral.

Birmingham, March 17.—Worshipers in the cathedral found the walls and floors of the edifice covered with suffragette proclamations in white letters a foot high, reading: "Votes for women! The clergy must rise in our behalf and stop the torturing of women in prison!" Every foot of space except the altar has a sign painted on it, including the pews. It is believed women concealed themselves in the cathedral Saturday night.

Hundred Houses Unroofed.

Queenstown, Ireland, March 16.—A severe gale caused heavy damage to property and shipping here. The roofs of over 100 houses were ripped off by the wind. The Cunard liner Andania, from Boston, after being delayed for several hours in the inner harbor, was obliged to proceed to Liverpool without landing its passengers.

Rain of Mud is Reported.

Tiflis, Russia, March 17. — An unusual phenomenon occurred here and in adjacent towns Sunday. The sky was covered early in the morning with dark yellow clouds and fog. Later there was a heavy snowfall mixed with dust which covered the ground in a thick layer of pasty mud. The phenomenon is attributed to storms in the Baku district, where the wind raised such tremendous clouds of dust that railway traffic was stopped by accumulations of it piled at various stations.

CANADA WINNING CHAMPIONSHIPS IN AGRICULTURE

The Latest Is Winning Championship for Oats a Third Time.

Recently was published the fact of remarkable winnings by Canadian farmers in several events during the past three or four years. The latest is that of Messrs. J. C. Hill & Sons of Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, who won in a hard contest for the oat championship over Montana. At the National Corn Exposition at Dallas during February, Montana oats were awarded the championship for the United States. Waiting for the winner of this to be announced was a peck of oats belonging to the Canadian growers above mentioned, and alongside of these was a like quantity belonging to a Minnesota grower, who was barred from the regular competition because he was at one time the winner of the trophy—the prize. The three entries were side by side on the judge's bench. It would not be possible to bring together three more likely samples. The Montana and Saskatchewan entries were of equal weight—50 pounds to the bushel. The Minnesota sample was some three pounds lighter. The award was unanimous in favor of the Saskatchewan oats. A remarkable feature and one greatly to the credit of the Canadian product was that the oats, grown in 1913, were grown and shown by those who had competed during the past two years, winning on each occasion. This, the third winning, gave them for the third time the world's championship and full possession of the splendid $1,500 silver trophy contributed by the state of Colorado.

The oats which have thus given to Western Canada another splendid advertising card, were grown 300 miles north of the International boundary line, proving that in this latitude, all the smaller grains can be grown with greater perfection and with more abundant yield than further south. In all this country are to be found farmers who produce oats running from 42 to 48 pounds to the bushel, and with yields of from 60 to 100 bushels per acre. Wheat also does well, grades high, and yields from 30 to 40 bushels per acre. The same may be said of any portion of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, famed over the world not only as a country where championship grains are grown, but where cattle and horses are raised that also carry off championships and where wild grasses are abundant yielders, cultivated hay and alfalfa are grown, thus giving plenty of feed, and with a good climate, sufficient shelter and plenty of water, bring about results such as western Canada has been able to record. Thousands of farmers from the United States who have their homes in Canada bear ample testimony to the benefits they have derived from farming in western Canada.—Advertisement.

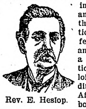
A CLERGYMAN'S TESTIMONY.



Rev. E. Heslop.

The Rev. Edmund Heslop of Wigton, Pa., suffered from Dropsy for a year. His limbs and feet were swollen and puffed. He had heart fluttering, was dizzy and exhausted at the least exertion. Hands and feet were cold and he had such a dragging sensation across the loins that it was difficult to move. After using 5 boxes of Dodds Kidney Pills the swelling disappeared and he felt himself again. He says he has been benefited and blessed by the use of Dodds Kidney Pills. Several months later he wrote: I have not changed my faith in your remedy since the above statement was authorized. Correspond with Rev. E. Heslop about this wonderful remedy.

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The boy becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis' son while the former goes to America. The Marquis asks Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her lackeys. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill, in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis' brother Francois lures the Austrians from the hotel allowing the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years, in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants, and through him sends word to his friends of his plight. The general, Alixe and Pietro plans Francois' escape. Francois receives a note from Pietro explaining in detail how to escape from his prison. Alixe awaits him on horseback and leads him to his friends on board the American sailing vessel, the "Lovely Lucy." Francois, as a guest of Harry Hampton, on the "Lovely Lucy," goes to America to manage Pietro's estate in Virginia. Lucy Hampton falls in love with Francois. Prince Louis Napoleon in America becomes the guest of the Hamptons, where he meets Francois. Lucy Hampton reveals her love for Francois after the latter saves the life of Harry Hampton and is himself injured in the effort. Francois tells Lucy of his love for Alixe. He returns to France and tells Alixe his one wish in life is that she love Pietro. Francois joins the political plotters. His health fails and he is forced to return to America. Later Napoleon summons him to London to aid him in his plots to gain the French throne. Lucy Hampton weds her cousin.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—Continued.

"Mademoiselle Lucy," he said. "I have something to ask of you."

"I will do it," Lucy promised blithely, not waiting for details.

Francois laughed. "You trust one, Mademoiselle Lucy—that is plain. Then his face became serious. "Do you remember a talk we once had together when I told you of my old playmate, Alixe?"

The bride-to-be flushed furiously as she recalled that talk. Then she nodded in a matter-of-fact manner. "I remember very well," she said. "It was when I threw myself at your head and you said you didn't want me."

Francois' shoulders and hands and eyes went upward together into an eminently French gesture. "What a horror!" he cried. "What an unspeakable manner to recollect that talk! How can you? How can you be so brutal to me?"

Both of them, at that, burst into light-hearted laughter. Lucy was grave suddenly.

"But you have something to ask me, Francois. You spoke of your—playmate—beautiful Alixe."

"It is only you whom I could ask to do this, Mademoiselle Lucy. I have never told anyone else about her. Only you know of"—the words came slowly—"of my love for her. She does not know it. Alixe does not know. And I may be killed, one sees, in this fight for the prince. Quite easily. And Alixe will not know. I do not like that. In fact I cannot bear it. So this is what I ask of you, dear mademoiselle." He brought out a letter and held it to her. "If you hear that I am killed, will you send it to Alixe?"

Lucy took the letter and turned it over doubtfully. "I do not like this sort of post-mortem commission, Francois. I feel as if I were holding your death-warrant."

"But it is not by a bit of writing I shall meet my finish, mademoiselle. I promise not to die one minute sooner for that letter. It is only that it will make me happy to know you will send it."

So Lucy, holding the letter gingerly, agreed. But as Francois rose to go she stood by him a moment and laid her hand on his coat sleeve. "Francois—I want to tell you something."

"But yes, mademoiselle—yes, Lucy."

"It is something wrong."

"Yes—Lucy."

"I am going to tell Harry I said it."

"Yes."

"This is it, then"—and Francois, smiling, waited and there was deep silence in the big, cool, quiet drawing-room for as long as a minute. "This is it, then. I don't know how I can be so unreasonable—but I am. I love Harry—I am happy. But I am quite—jealous of Alixe. And I think you are the most wonderful person I have ever known—much more wonderful than Harry. If there had been no Alixe; if you had—liked me—I can imagine having adored you. I do adore you, Francois. Now, how is all that compatible with my joy in marrying Harry? I don't know how it is—but it is so. I am a wicked sinful person—but it is so."

The next time Lucy Hampton saw Francois it was when, white-robed and sweet in her enveloping mist of veil she went up the chancel steps of the little Virginia country church, and looking up met a smile that was a benediction from the man whom she had loved, who stood close now at the side of her lover, her husband.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The Prince's Bright Shadow.

There are old people living in England today who remember hearing their fathers and mothers speak of a young Frenchman of uncommon personality, constantly seen with Prince Louis Napoleon during the last days of his life in London in the year 1840. Lady Constance Cecil nicknamed this Frenchman "the prince's bright shadow." There seemed to be a closer tie than brotherhood between them, and the tradition runs that the mystical prince had a superstition that his luck went with him in the person of the Chevalier Beaupre.

It was all as it should be; he was entirely happy. He had asked three wishes of the good fairies, as he had said long ago; that the prince should be emperor—that he might become "a marshal of France under another Bonaparte"—that Alixe should love him. The first two he believed about to be realized. The last? It was not now the time to think of that. Alixe had kissed him good-by. That would more than do till the fight was over. So he sped back to London, missing Pietro, but hopeful and buoyant. And in London there was a letter for him from Virginia.

"Dear Francois," Lucy began. "To think that the first letter sent to you by Harry's wife should be to tell you that she has betrayed your trust in her. I am distressed beyond words, for I have made a mistake which may mean distress to you. You remember the letter to Alixe which you trusted to me to send in case anything should happen to you? I had it in my hand the week after my wedding when I had gone upstairs to get other letters for Europe which my father had commanded me to send by the next packet. And in some stupid unexplainable way I slipped yours—your precious letter—among them in place of one to my father's agents in London, and I hurried down and gave the parcel to Sambo, who was waiting to ride to Norfolk with them. And then Harry and I went away on a visit to Martin's Brandon for three days, and it was only when I came back that I discovered the dreadful mistake I had made. Can you ever forgive me? Harry and I thought over every possibility of stopping it, but there seemed to be no chance. Are you very angry with me, dear friend of Harry's and of mine?"

The letter went on with reproaches and regrets and finally slipped into a tale of a new happy life which Francois had made possible for the two. He read it over several times. His letter to Alixe, which should have been sent only after his death, had gone to her. What then? She would know that he loved her; that he had loved her always; that he would love her forever; that the one wish of his life had been that she should love himself—not Pietro. He had said that in the letter; that was all. He was glad that she should know, though he would never have told her in life. It was done and he would find out now if Pietro indeed cared for her, if she cared for Pietro. And if not, then one had waited long enough; then at last—the joy of the thought choked him.

The Gray Eyes Met Hers.

A knock came at the door of the room in the London lodging where he sat with Lucy Hampton's letter before him. Fritz Rickenbach stood there; his highness would like to see the chevalier. All personal thoughts were locked swiftly into the drawer with Lucy's letter and "the prince's bright shadow" went to the prince.

CHAPTER XXX.

The Third Wish.

On the day when Francois in London read that letter of Lucy Hampton's which had awaited his return from France, a letter from Lucy Hampton reached Alixe at the chateau of Vicques. She carried it to Pietro's room where he sat in a deep chair at a window which looked over Delesmontes valley and the racing Cheulte river, and the village strung on the shores. His elbow on the stone window-sill, his chin in his hand, he stared at the familiar picture.

Alixe, coming in without knocking at the open door, stepped across and stood by him, and he did not lift his head, his listless eyes did not yet shift their gaze from the broad landscape. Alixe, looking down at the black head with its short curls set in thick locks—after the manner of the curls of Praxiteles' Hermes—was startled to see many bright lines of gray through the dark mass. Was everybody getting old? Francois with the broad band of white in his hair—and now Pietro—big little Pietro, who had come to them and learned to ride Coq and played with them. Was Pietro getting old and gray?

By one of the sudden impulses characteristic of her, her hand flew out and rested on the curled head as if to protect it, motherly, from the whitening of time.

And Pietro turned slowly and looked up at her with eyes full of hopelessness and adoration. Such a look he had never before given her; such a look no one could mistake except a woman who would not let herself understand.

"It is good to be up and at the window, isn't it?" Alixe spoke cheerfully, and her hand left his head and she went on in a gay disengaged tone. "You will be downstairs in two or three days now, and then it is only a jump to being out and about, and then—then in a minute you will be well again."

"Oh, yes," Pietro answered without animation. "It will not be long before I am well."

"Look, Pietro;" Alixe held out the paper in her hand. "Such a queer letter! From Virginia. From the little Lucy Hampton of whom Francois talks. I don't understand it. Will you let me read it to you?"

"Surely," said Pietro, and waited with his unsmiling eyes on her face.

"My dear mademoiselle," Alixe read. "I am writing to beg your forgiveness, as I have begged that of the Chevalier Beaupre, for the very great fault I have committed. The chevalier trusted to me a letter for you which was to have been sent you only in case of a certain event; by a carelessness which, unmeant as it was, I shall never forgive myself, I gave it with other letters to our negro Sambo to be posted at once. By now it may have reached you. I cannot tell if I have made trouble or not, but in any case, I cannot rest without saying to you—as well as to the Chevalier—how sorry I am. If you can find it in your heart to forgive me, please do so, dear mademoiselle. That I should have made trouble for one as dear to the chevalier as you are is a deep grief to me. He has talked to me of you. With a very earnest prayer again for your forgiveness I am, mademoiselle, yours faithfully and sincerely.—Lucy Hampton Hampton."

Pietro looked bewildered. "What is it about?" he asked.

"I wonder," and Alixe laughed and frowned at the paper in her hand. "It seems Francois wrote me a letter and left it with little Mistress Hampton to be sent 'in case of a certain event.' What event? What a strange thing for Francois to do! And then he came to us here and said nothing of mysterious letters left cooking in Virginia. I cannot make it out, Pietro—can you?"

"Not I," said Pietro.

"The letter of Francois has not come; that is certain; I wonder if the negro Sambo lost it."

"Probably," Pietro said. "It should have come before this one, otherwise."

"It is a riddle," Alixe decided, "and I never guess them." Then, dropping into a seat on the wide window-sill, "Pietro—you are letting yourself be depressed."

The gray eyes met hers with something that seemed a wall of reserve in their steady glance. "I think possibly I miss having no exercise," he said. "I will feel more natural when I can get about."

Alixe looked at him. "You are eating your heart out to be with Francois," she said, and laid her hand on his.

Pietro stared as if the light touch had shaken him; then slowly his large fingers twisted lightly around the small ones, and he turned his face again, holding her hand so, to the window and the view of the valley and the river and the village. A moment they sat so, the girl's hand loose in the hollow of the man's; a slow red crept into Alixe's face; there was confusion in her brain. She had laid her hand on that of her brother; her brother had taken it in his—and behold, by a witchcraft it was all changed. This delicate big grasp that held her was not brotherly; through all her veins suddenly she knew that; the flush shot up to her eyes, to her forehead, and she tried, with an attempt at an everyday manner, to draw her hand away. But Pietro, his set pale face toward the window, his eyes gazing out, held her hand. With that the world had reeled and was whirling past her. Pietro had caught both her hands in a tight grip and had drawn them against him, was holding them there, was looking at her with a face which not even she, this time, might mistake.

"Alixe," he said, "I know you don't care for me. I know you love Francois. I did not mean ever to speak, but when you put your hand on mine—"

He held her palms together and parted the palms and kissed the finger-tips, first of one and then of the other, as if he kissed something holy.

"I shall never speak again, but this once I will. I always loved you—one must. I knew always that a slow silent person like me would have no chance against a fellow like Francois. So I have kept still, and it was hard. It won't be so hard now that you know. Are you angry, Alixe?"

Alixe, with her head bent so that Pietro did not see her face, with her head bending lower—lower, suddenly was on her knees by the chair and her face was on Pietro's arm.

"Alixe," he whispered, "what is it—what have I done?"

But the brown waves of hair with the blue ribbon tied around them lay motionless on his arm. And suddenly a thought shook him.

"It cannot be!" he gasped.

And Alixe lifted her face, and the exaggerated black lashes lifted, and the blue glance lifted and rested on Pietro's black hair bent down where the light shone on the silver lines through it. Up flashed her hand impulsively, gently—as Alixe did things, and touched the thick lock with an infinitely delicate caress. "Your hair—is all turning gray," she whispered in two quick breaths, and at that, in some occult fashion Pietro knew.

For moments they had no need of that makeshift, language; the great house was very quiet, and one heard the horses stamping in the paved courtyard and the grooms singing, and yet one did not hear it. Distant sounds came from the village, but one only knew that long after, in remembering that morning. All they knew was that the ghost of a lifelong affection of brother and sister stood before them, changed by a miracle to a shining angel into whose face, for these first moments, they dared not look. Then slowly, exquisitely, courage came and, hand close in hand, they looked at each other astonished, glad. It was Pietro and Alixe still, the ancient playfellows, the childhood friends—all the dear familiarity was there yet, but no longer were they brother and sister. And then, after a while they began to compare notes of things hidden.

"When did you begin—to like me—this way, Pietro?"

"I don't know," answered Pietro stupidly. "Does it make any difference?"

"A great deal," Alixe insisted. "It's important. It's historical."

"But this isn't history," said Pietro.

Alixe, however, returned to the charge. "Last year?"
